

HOMER

THE ILIAD

Complete provisional interior architecture proof

6.625 x 10.25 inch comic-size hardcover / 80# coated paper target

Translation status: first-pass draft; Greek-fidelity and editorial gates remain open.

FORWARD

By A. Thucydides

The discord between Achilles and Agamemnon, spurred by Chryses' plea and the subsequent plague, laid bare the fragility of command. Even in that renowned assembly, accounts differed on the affront and the ensuing pestilence. The logistics of leading a thousand ships, though formidable, could not overcome the deep-seated rivalries that turned warriors against their own. Such internal strife, like a hidden reef, threatens even the grandest expeditions.

Later, when the Achaeans falter before Troy's walls, the embassy to Achilles reveals the intractable nature of human will. Offers of gold and women could not mend the slight to a warrior's honor, nor could the urgent need for victory overcome the memory of insult. The very structures of command, built on hierarchy and expectation, became the instruments of their own undoing, turning men into mere numbers, expendable against the stone walls of a city.

Thus, the body of Hector, so long the prize of contention and the measure of Achaean wrath, was returned to Troy. This exchange, wrought by an old king's entreaty and a warrior's fleeting pity, marked a pause in the struggle. It showed that command, even when absolute, must at last reckon with the cost not of glory, but of bodies and the sorrow within the walls of a household. For all the boasts of conquest, the true tally was found in the empty spaces left behind.

BOOK I

First-pass working translation

Sing, goddess, of the wrath of Peleus' son Achilles, the ruinous wrath that brought unnumbered grief upon the Achaeans, and sent many brave souls before their time into the house of Hades, making their bodies prey for dogs and every bird—while Zeus's will was brought toward fulfillment—from that first hour when Atreus' son, the king of men, and godlike Achilles stood at odds.
Who, then, among the gods joined them in strife?
The son of Leto and of Zeus. For he, angered against the king, sent through the host a deadly plague; and the people perished, because Agamemnon had dishonored Chryses, the priest, who came before the swift ships, to ransom his dear daughter, bearing gifts beyond all measure, and in his hands the wreath and golden staff of far-darting Apollo; he prayed to all the Achaeans, but most of all to Atreus' sons, the marshals of the people.
The priest came then to the shore, and prayed to Apollo, the lord who bears the silver bow, and called upon him: “Hear me, you of the fair hair, you who keep Chryse and holy Cilla, and who rule Tenedos in power; if ever I have built you a pleasing temple, or burned for you the rich thigh-pieces of bulls and goats, grant this desire: let the Danaans pay for my tears beneath your arrows.” So he prayed, and Phoebus Apollo heard him. Down from Olympus he came, his heart full of anger, carrying his bow and covered quiver. The arrows rang upon his shoulder as the god moved; and he sat apart from the ships, then loosed a shaft. First the mules and swift hounds he struck; afterward he turned his bitter arrows against the men. Through all the camp the pyres burned without rest.

For nine days the shafts of the god went forth.
On the tenth, Achilles called the people to assembly.
Hera of the white arms had put the thought within him, grieving for the Danaans as she watched them perish.
When they had gathered, Achilles rose among them:
“Son of Atreus, soon we shall be driven back again, wandering among the waves, if any man remains alive.
Come, let us ask a seer, or priest, or interpreter of dreams—for dreams are also from Zeus—to tell us why Phoebus is so bitter, whether he blames our vows or hecatombs, and whether he might meet us again and ward the ruin off by the savor of lambs
and goats made perfect in sacrifice.” He sat, and Calchas rose among them, Thestor's son, the best of augurs, who knew what is, what was, and what will be,
and who had led the Achaean ships to Ilium by that prophetic art Apollo gave to him.
With thoughtful speech he answered them and said: “Achilles, dear to Zeus, you ask me to declare the wrath of Apollo, lord of the far-shooting bow.

I will speak it;
but swear to stand beside me, and be ready in word and hand. For I think that man will soon be angered against me, the one who rules the Argives, and whose word the army must obey.
No light thing is a king's resentment;
stronger is a king when angered against a lesser man. If he hides his anger for a day, it grows and waits for payment.”
Achilles answered him: “Speak freely.
No one here, while I draw breath and look upon the light of day, shall lift a hand against you—not Agamemnon,
though he names himself the greatest of the Greeks.”
Then the blameless seer took courage and spoke:
“No vow, no hecatomb, no offering is lacking.
The god's wrath is for Chryses and his daughter, whom Agamemnon will not release.
Send her home, without a price or ransom; sacrifice at Chryse.
Then the god may turn from us and end the plague.”
Agamemnon, anger still black around his heart, rose and spoke to Calchas first: “Prophet of evil, never have you spoken good to me.

You love to prophesy what brings the army sorrow;

you have never spoken a good word or brought it to pass.

And now among the Danaans you declare that the far-shooter deals them pain because I would not accept the shining ransom for Chryseis, because I desired to keep her in my house.

I prefer her even to Clytemnestra, my wedded wife;
she is not less than Clytemnestra in form, in stature, in mind, or in the work of her hands.
Still, I will give her back, if that is better. I would rather keep my people safe than see them die.
But make ready another prize for me at once, so that I alone among the Argives do not go without my honor—you all see that my prize is being carried elsewhere.”

Achilles, swift of foot, looked at him darkly and answered:

“Son of Atreus, most glorious and most greedy of all men, how shall the great-hearted Achaeans give you a prize?

We know of no common stores lying in abundance here:

the spoils from the cities we took have been divided, and it would not be fitting to gather the people together and make them give those portions back. Send this girl to the god now; and when we take Troy's well-built city, we shall pay you three and four times over, if Zeus grants it.”

Agamemnon, king of men, replied:

“Do not, godlike Achilles, though you are good, hide your thought and try to deceive me; you will not slip past me or persuade me.

Do you want to keep your own prize while I sit here without one, and command me to give this girl away? If the great-hearted Achaeans give me a prize, making it fit my desire, so be it. But if they do not, I myself will take one—yours, Ajax's, or Odysseus's—and carry it away.

The man I visit will be angry; we shall settle that another time.

For now, haul the black ship down to the shining sea, gather rowers in proper number, put the hecatomb aboard, and send fair-cheeked Chryseis. Let one of the counselors lead:

Ajax, Idomeneus, godlike Odysseus—or you, son of Peleus, most terrible of men—so that you may appease the far-shooter by performing the holy rites.”

Achilles, looking darkly at him, answered:

“Ah, clothed in shamelessness and bent on gain—who among the Achaeans

will follow you freely, whether to march or fight in battle?

I did not come here to fight the spear-famed Trojans for my own sake:

they have never wronged me. They never drove off my cattle or my

horses;
they never in Phthia, rich in soil and men, destroyed my harvest—there are shadowed mountains and the sounding sea between us.
No: we followed you, great shameless one, to win honor for Menelaus and for you, dog-face, from the Trojans—though you neither notice nor care.
And now you threaten to take from me the prize for which I labored, which the sons of the Achaeans gave me. I never receive a prize equal to yours when the Achaeans sack a well-inhabited Trojan city; my hands bear the greater burden of the furious war.
But when the division comes, your prize is far larger, while I carry a small but cherished portion to my ships, after I have grown weary fighting.
Now I will go to Phthia: it is far better to sail home in my curved ships
than to remain here dishonored and heap up wealth and treasure for you.” “Go, then, if your heart urges you; I do not beg you to stay for my sake.
There are others here who will honor me, and Zeus above all, the counselor. You are the most hateful of the kings he nourishes.
Strife, wars, and battles are always dear to you.
If you are mighty, some god has given you that gift.

Go home with your ships and companions, rule your Myrmidons; I care nothing for your wrath, nor do I count it as a threat.
But this I tell you: as Phoebus Apollo takes Chryseis from me, I will send her away in my ship with my companions;
then I myself will go to your hut and take fair-cheeked Briseis, your prize, so that you may know how much stronger I am than you, and that every other man may fear to call himself my equal.” Then grief and anger gathered in Achilles' chest.
He weighed two thoughts: to draw his sword from his thigh and scatter the assembly, or to master his heart and endure.
As he drew the great blade, Athena came down from heaven, sent by the white-armed goddess Hera, who loved both men.
She stood behind him, visible to him alone, and caught his hair.
Achilles turned and said: “Why have you come, child of Zeus?
To watch the insolence of Agamemnon? I tell you this:
his life, I think, will soon pay for what he has done.”
The goddess of flashing eyes answered him:
“I came to restrain you. Put away the sword.
Speak against him as fiercely as you will, but do not strike.
One day, for this dishonor, gifts three times over will be set before you. Hold your hand and obey.”

Achilles answered: “A man must obey you, goddess, though anger burns. It is better so. Whoever obeys the gods, the gods hear him in return.” He drove the blade back into its sheath, and Athena rose again to Olympus.

Then he faced the son of Atreus and spoke once more:

“You who wear a dog's eyes and carry a deer's heart, never do you arm with the people for battle, never go with the best into an ambush or the line.

That would be death to you. It is easier to walk the camp and strip a man of his prize. You rule men who obey you, because you are a king who feeds upon his own people.

Otherwise, son of Atreus, this would be your last outrage.

But I swear a great oath: by this staff, which will never again put forth leaf or branch, since bronze cut it from the mountain and stripped its bark, and now judges carry it in their hands, judges who keep the laws that come from Zeus—so surely shall a day come when all the Achaeans will long for Achilles. Then, though you suffer, you cannot help them, when Hector, breaker of ranks, kills men beside their ships.

You will tear your heart for the champion you dishonored.”

He flung the gold-studded staff upon the ground and sat.

Across from him Agamemnon still raged. But Nestor rose, the clear-speaking elder from Pylos, whose tongue flowed sweeter than honey. Two generations of mortal men had passed before him, and now he ruled among the third. He addressed them:

“What sorrow has come upon the Achaean land!

The Trojans would rejoice, and Priam's sons, and all the rest, if they could hear you. End this quarrel. You are both younger than I, and I have stood beside men greater than you.

Yet they listened when I spoke, and followed my counsel.

Listen now. You, Agamemnon, do not take the girl; let her remain. And you, Achilles, do not contend with the king, since no other scepter-bearing man has honor equal to his. If you are the stronger, still he is greater in rank, and more men obey him.”

Achilles cut him off: “No coward would endure your words.

Let others take your commands; do not command me:

I do not think I shall obey you any longer. And mark this well:

I will not fight you with my hands for the girl's sake, nor you, nor any other man, since you have taken her from me.

But of all the other things I have beside my swift black ship, you shall carry off none against my will. Come—try it, so that these men may see: your black blood will run around my spear.” They broke the assembly. Achilles went to his ships with Patroclus and his companions.
Agamemnon hauled a swift ship down to the sea, chose twenty rowers, and put aboard the hecatomb for the god. He led fair-cheeked Chryseis aboard, and set wise Odysseus as captain.
They climbed in and sailed the wet roads of the sea; meanwhile Agamemnon ordered the army to cleanse itself. They washed and cast the filth into the sea, then sacrificed perfect hecatombs of bulls and goats to Apollo beside the shore of the barren sea; the smoke curled upward to heaven.
But the king did not cease from the quarrel he had first threatened.
He called Talthybius and Eurybates, his heralds and eager servants: “Go to the hut of Achilles, son of Peleus; take fair-cheeked Briseis by the hand and lead her here. If he will not give her, I myself will come with more men and take her—and that will be worse for him.” They went unwillingly along the barren shore and came to the huts and ships of the Myrmidons. They found Achilles sitting beside his hut and black ship. He was not glad to see them. They stood, afraid and ashamed before the king, and said nothing.

Achilles knew why they had come and spoke first: “Hail, heralds, messengers of Zeus and of men. Come nearer.
You are not to blame; Agamemnon is to blame, who sent you for the girl. Patroclus, beloved companion, bring her out and give her to them. Let these two be witnesses before the blessed gods, before mortal men, and before the harsh king himself, if ever again there is need of me to ward disgraceful death from the others.
For he sacrifices with a mind bent on destruction; he does not know how to think at once of what is before him and what is behind, so that the Achaeans beside the ships might fight in safety.” Patroclus obeyed his beloved companion. He led fair-cheeked Briseis
from the hut and gave her to the heralds, who returned to the Achaean ships.
The woman went unwillingly.
Achilles sat apart from his companions,
weeping, on the shore of the gray sea, and looked out across the boundless water.
He stretched both hands toward his dear mother and prayed: “Mother, since you bore me though I was doomed to a short life, at least Olympian Zeus, the high-thundering one, should have granted me honor; but now he has honored me not even a little. Agamemnon, son of Atreus, wide-ruling, has dishonored me: he has taken my prize,

and keeps it for himself.”

His mother heard him from the depths of the sea, seated beside her old father.

Swiftly she rose from the gray sea like a mist, sat before her weeping
son, caressed him with her hand, and called him by name:

“Child, why do you weep? What grief has come into your heart?

Speak out; do not hide it within you.
Let us both know.”

With a heavy groan Achilles
answered:

“You know it. Why should I tell it all to you, who know it already?

We went to sacred Thebes, the city of Eetion; we sacked it and brought everything here. The sons of the Achaeans divided it fairly among themselves, but they chose fair-cheeked Chryseis for Agamemnon.

Then Chryses, priest of far-darting Apollo, came to the swift ships of the bronze-clad Achaeans to ransom his daughter, bringing immeasurable gifts and holding in his hands the wreath and golden staff of the far-shooting god. He begged all the Achaeans, and above all the two sons of Atreus, commanders of the people.

All the other Achaeans approved: they urged reverence for the priest and acceptance of the shining ransom. But Agamemnon's heart did not consent;

he sent the old man away harshly and laid a strong command upon him.

The old man went back in anger, and Apollo heard his prayer, for he loved him dearly. He shot a deadly arrow among the Argives, and the people died one after another as the god's shafts moved everywhere

through the wide camp of the Achaeans. Then the prophet who knew the god's will spoke among us. I was the first to order that the god be appeased.

But anger seized the son of Atreus; he rose at once and threatened me—and the threat is now fulfilled. The Achaeans are sending Chryseis to Chryse in the swift ship, with gifts for the lord;

and heralds have just taken from my hut Briseis,

the girl the sons of the Achaeans gave me. Now, if you can, protect your son: go to Olympus and supplicate Zeus. If ever you helped his heart by word or deed—for many times in my father's house

I heard you boast that you alone among the immortals saved the dark-clouded son of Cronus from disgrace, when Hera, Poseidon, and Athena wanted to bind him. You came and loosed him, goddess, quickly calling to high Olympus the Hundred-Handed One, whom the gods call Briareus and men Aegaeon, stronger even than his father;

he sat beside the son of Cronus in glory, and the blessed gods feared
him
and did not bind Zeus. Remind him of this, sit beside him, and clasp his knees,
if he will somehow help the Trojans, drive the Achaeans back to their ships and the sea, and let them be cut down, so that all may profit by their king;
so that Agamemnon may learn what madness he committed when he dishonored the best of the Achaeans.” Thetis answered him, weeping: “Ah, my child, why did I raise you, bearing such bitter grief?
Would that you could sit beside the ships without tears and without pain, since your portion of life is short and not long at all.
But now you are short-lived and more miserable than all men; for an evil destiny I bore you in my halls. I will go myself to Olympus, to Zeus who delights in thunder, and tell him these things, to see if he will listen. But for now sit beside your swift ships, hold your wrath against the Achaeans, and withdraw altogether from war.

For Zeus went yesterday to Ocean and the blameless Ethiopians to feast, and all the gods went with him. On the twelfth day he will return to Olympus;
then I will go to his bronze-floored house, clasp his knees, and I think I shall persuade him.” Meanwhile Odysseus reached sacred Chryse, bringing the holy hecatomb. When they entered the deep harbor, they furled the sails, laid them in the black ship, lowered the mast into its rest, and rowed swiftly to anchorage.
They cast out the anchors and made fast the stern-lines; then they stepped ashore through the breakers, and brought out the hecatomb for the far-shooting god.
Chryseis too came down from the seafaring ship.
Wise Odysseus led her to the altar, placed her in her dear father's hands, and spoke: “Chryses, Agamemnon, king of men, sent me to bring your child and sacrifice this holy hecatomb to Phoebus for the Danaans, so that we may appease the lord who has brought such grievous sorrows upon the Argives.”

He placed her in her father's hands, and the old man received his child with joy. The Achaeans then set the well-built hecatomb around the altar of the far-shooter, washed their hands, and lifted the barley for the rite.
Chryses prayed aloud, his hands raised to heaven: “Hear me, god of the silver bow, who guard Chryse, holy Cilla, and rule Tenedos in strength.
You heard me before when I prayed; you honored me and struck the Achaean people with a great blow.
Grant me this wish once more: defend the Danaans now from their shameful plague.” So he prayed, and Phoebus Apollo heard him.
When they had prayed and scattered the barley, they drew back the heads, cut the throats, flayed the victims, and cut out the thighs.
They wrapped them in fat, laid raw flesh upon them, and the old man burned them on split wood, pouring bright wine over them;
young men stood beside him with five-pronged forks in their hands.
When the thighs had burned and they had tasted the inward parts, they cut the rest into pieces, pierced it on spits, roasted it carefully, and drew all the meat away.

When the work was finished and the feast prepared, they ate, and no man's heart lacked an equal portion.
When they had satisfied hunger and thirst, the young men filled the mixing bowls, and poured the wine into every cup, beginning on the right.
All day the young Achaeans appeased the god with song, singing the beautiful paean and praising the far-shooter; and he rejoiced to hear them.
When the sun had set and darkness came, they slept beside the ship.
When rose the early-born, rosy-fingered Dawn, they sailed back toward the wide Achaean camp.
The far-shooter sent them a fair wind. They raised the mast, spread the white sails, and the wind filled the middle canvas.
The purple wave roared around the speeding ship's stern, and she ran across the sea, cutting her road through the water.
When they reached the broad camp of the Achaeans, they hauled the black ship high upon the mainland sand, set long props beneath it, and scattered to their huts and ships.
But godlike Achilles, swift of foot, remained beside his swift ships, holding his wrath. He never went to the assembly that brings men glory, never went out to battle; his dear heart wasted where he sat, longing for the battle-cry and the war.

When the twelfth dawn had appeared, all the everlasting gods went together to Olympus, with Zeus leading them.

Thetis did not forget her son's command. She rose from the sea and climbed like mist through the great heavens to Olympus.

She found the wide-seeing son of Cronus sitting apart from the others on the highest peak of many-ridged Olympus. She sat before him, clasped his knees with her left hand, touched his chin with her right, and supplicated Zeus, the son of Cronus:

"Father Zeus, if ever among the immortals I helped you by word or deed, fulfill this wish for me.

Honor my son, who is doomed to die before all others.

Agamemnon, king of men, has dishonored him; he took his prize and keeps it for himself.

But honor him, Olympian Zeus, counselor of the gods; give the Trojans strength until the Achaeans honor my son and increase his standing."

She spoke. Zeus, gatherer of clouds, did not answer.

He sat long in silence. Thetis held fast to his knees and asked him once more:

"Give me an unfailing promise and incline your head, or refuse me—there is no fear in you—so I may know how utterly I am dishonored among the gods."

Zeus groaned heavily and answered:

"Ah, what a difficult task you set me: Hera will quarrel with me when she taunts me with reproachful words.

Even without this, she is always scolding me before the immortals, and says that I aid the Trojans in battle.

Go back now, before Hera notices. I will remember this and bring it to fulfillment. To make you trust me,

I will nod with my head; there is no greater sign among the immortals.

What I confirm with a nod cannot be revoked, denied, or left unfulfilled."

The son of Cronus bent his dark brows and nodded.

His immortal hair streamed forward from his head, and he shook great Olympus beneath him.

So they took counsel and parted.

Thetis plunged into the deep sea from bright Olympus, while Zeus went to his own house.

All the gods rose from their seats together when their father approached; none dared remain seated to meet him.

Hera of the white arms had not failed to see him. She knew that the silver-footed Thetis, daughter of the old man of the sea, had shared his counsels. At once she spoke with taunting words:

“Who was it now, crafty one, who shared your secret counsel?

You always love to think in secret, apart from me,
and never willingly tell me what you have decided.”

The father of gods and men answered her:

“Hera, do not hope to know all my thoughts.

They will be difficult for you, though you are my wife.

No one else, god or man, will learn first the thought that I wish to keep apart from everyone.”

Ox-eyed, revered Hera answered:

“Most terrible son of Cronus, what have you said?

I neither ask you nor question you; sit quietly and think whatever you wish. But I fear terribly that silver-footed Thetis, daughter of the old man of the sea, came to you at dawn, sat beside you, and clasped your knees.

I think you promised her truly to honor Achilles and destroy many Achaeans beside their ships.”

Zeus, gatherer of clouds, answered:

“Strange one, you are always thinking and never escape my notice.
Yet you will accomplish nothing; you will only become farther from my heart.

And that will be worse for you. Sit down in silence and obey my word, lest all the gods on Olympus fail to help you when I stretch my invincible hands against you.”

Hera fell silent, afraid, and sat with her heart subdued.

The heavenly gods within Zeus's house were troubled.

Then Hephaestus, famous for his craft, rose to speak, bringing comfort to his dear, white-armed mother:

“This will be a disastrous and unbearable thing if you two quarrel so over mortal
men,

and bring disorder among the gods.
There will be no joy in the good feast, because the worse thing has prevailed.

I urge my mother—and she knows this herself—to bring comfort to our dear father Zeus, so that he will not scold her again and disturb our feast.”

He leapt up and placed a beautiful double cup in his mother's hands, and spoke again:

“Endure, my mother, and bear it, though you love me dearly, lest I see you struck before my eyes and be unable to help you.

It is hard to stand against the Olympian. Once before, when I came eager to defend you, he seized me by the foot and hurled me from the threshold of heaven.

All day I fell, and at sunset I landed in Lemnos, with little life remaining. There the Sintian men cared for me at once.”

He spoke, and the white-armed goddess Hera smiled, smiling, she accepted the cup from her son's hand.

He poured sweet nectar for all the other gods in turn, drawing it from the mixing bowl.
Unquenchable laughter rose among the blessed gods when they saw Hephaestus bustling through the hall.

So they feasted all day until the sun went down, and no heart lacked its equal portion—not Apollo's beautiful lyre, nor the Muses' lovely answering song.
When the sun's bright light had set, each god went to his own house, where famous, lame-footed Hephaestus had built a dwelling with his knowing mind. Zeus, Olympian lord of the thunderbolt, went to the bed where he had slept before whenever sweet sleep came upon him.

He climbed into it and slept; beside him lay Hera of the golden throne.

Source range: Book 1. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Apollo descending upon the Achaean camp

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by Blake's visual language but not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 2

First-pass working translation

When the other gods and the armed men had slept through the dark night, Zeus who gathers clouds kept wake.
He thought how he might honor Achilles, and bring the Achaeans to destruction beside their ships.
At last he found the counsel best: send a false dream to Agamemnon, son of Atreus, king of men.
He called the Dream, and spoke with winged words:
“Go now, deceptive Dream, and stand beside the bed of Agamemnon, in the likeness of old Nestor, who is most trusted by the king. Tell him every word as I command. Say: ‘Arm all the long-haired Achaeans.
Now you may take the city of broad-streeted Troy.
The gods who hold Olympus no longer disagree;
Hera has persuaded them, and ruin hangs above the Trojans.’” So he spoke, and the Dream went swiftly on its errand.
It stood above the king’s head, and took the likeness of Nestor, who spoke to him in sleep: “Son of Atreus, do you sleep? It is not right for a man who bears the cares of armies to lie awake no longer.

Zeus has sent me to say that the gods are now united;
though he is far away, he cares for you and takes pity on you.
He commands you to arm the Achaeans without delay.
You will take wide-wayed Troy. Do not let the message escape your mind when sweet sleep has released you.”
The Dream withdrew, leaving him to cherish in his heart the thoughts it had planted—thoughts that were never to be fulfilled.
He thought the immortal voice had spoken truth, not knowing what Zeus had devised, and that on that very day he would take Priam’s city. He did not know what the son of Cronus was still preparing: more pain and groaning for Trojans and Danaans through the violence of battle. and rose at once, putting on his soft wool tunic.
Over it he threw a great cloak, and bound beneath his feet his shining sandals. Then he slung the silver-studded sword across his shoulders, and took the scepter of his fathers, imperishable, with which he went among the Achaeans.
When Dawn, the goddess, climbed high Olympus to announce the light to Zeus and the other immortals, he first called the heralds, clear-voiced men, to summon the long-haired Achaeans to assembly.

They called, and the people gathered swiftly.

First Agamemnon summoned the council of the great-hearted elders beside Nestor's ship, and made his careful plan:

"Friends, a divine dream came to me through the ambrosial night.

It looked most like Nestor in form, size, and stature;

it stood above my head and spoke:
'Do you sleep, son of Atreus?

It is not right for a counselor, with peoples entrusted to him, to sleep all night. Listen quickly: I am a messenger of Zeus, who, though he is far away, cares greatly for you and pities you.

He commands you to arm the long-haired Achaeans at once.

Now you might take broad-wayed Troy, for the immortals who dwell in Olympus no longer deliberate apart: Hera has bent them all, and grief hangs over the Trojans by Zeus's will.'

So it spoke and flew away, and sweet sleep released me.

Come now, if we can, let us arm the sons of the Achaeans.

First I will test them with words, as custom allows,

and order them to flee with their many-oared ships;

you must hold them back, each man speaking from his place."

He sat, and Nestor, king of sandy Pylos, answered:

"If another Achaean had told us of this dream, we would call it false and urge a stronger flight.

But the man who claims to be the greatest of the Achaeans saw it. Come, let us arm the sons of the Achaeans."

So he spoke, and the council rose and obeyed the shepherd of the people.

As bees stream from a hollow rock in endless clusters, when spring flowers open across the field, and some fly in a cloud while others settle in the meadow—so the many tribes of the Achaeans came from ships and shelters, filing before the deep shore into assembly.

Rumor, Zeus's messenger, burned among them and urged them forward.

The gathering roared, the earth groaned beneath the seated people, and nine heralds shouted until they could quiet the noise enough for the god-nourished kings to be heard. The people sat in haste, and the clamor ceased. Agamemnon rose, holding the scepter that Hephaestus made and gave to Zeus, and Zeus to Hermes, the messenger who slays Argus; Hermes gave it to Pelops, the horse-driving king; Pelops left it to Atreus, shepherd of the people, and dying Atreus left it to Thyestes, rich in flocks;

Thyestes left it to Agamemnon to carry, that he might rule over many islands and all Argos.

Leaning upon it, he spoke:

“Friends, heroes, Danaans, servants of Ares, Zeus the son of Cronus has bound me in a great and ruinous delusion—cruel Zeus, who once promised and nodded that I would return after sacking well-built Ilium, but now has devised a wicked deception and commands me to return to Argos without glory, having lost so many people. So, it seems, it pleases mighty Zeus, who has destroyed the crowns of many cities and will destroy more: his power is greatest. It would be shameful for those yet unborn to hear that we, so many, fought an unprofitable war against fewer men and never reached its end.

If Achaeans and Trojans were counted under a faithful truce, if the Trojans gathered all who live within their city, and we Achaeans were arranged in tens, each ten choosing a Trojan to pour the wine, many tens of us would still lack a cupbearer: so much greater, I say, is our number than theirs.

But allies from many cities stand beside them, spear-bearing men, who keep me from taking the well-inhabited city of Ilium.

Nine years of great Zeus have already passed;

the timbers of our ships have rotted and the rigging has slackened.

Our wives and little children sit at home awaiting us, while our work here remains unfinished, for which we came.

Come now, let us all obey what I say: let us flee in our ships to our dear fatherland. We shall never take broad-wayed Troy.”

So he spoke, and stirred the hearts of all those who had not heard the council. The assembly moved like the long waves of the Icarian Sea, when East and South leap upon them from the clouds of Father Zeus; or as when the West Wind comes upon a deep field of grain, driving violently over the ears and bowing the standing corn.

The assembly broke. They surged toward the ships, shouting like waves that the south wind drives upon a beach, when a deep sea runs in beneath the open shore.

But Hera, who watched the Achaeans scatter, said to Athena:

“Daughter of Zeus, will the Argives leave this land, and give the glory of Helen to Priam and his sons?

Go now among them, and hold each man in place.”

Athena went down through the crowd. She found Odysseus, whose mind was equal to the gods, still standing by his scepter.

He did not touch a ship, nor prepare to flee.

She stood beside him and said: "Son of Laertes, why do you run as though every man were rushing home?

Sit here, and let the others sit as well.

The king's speech was a test, not an order to abandon the war."

Odysseus turned, and went among the men, taking the scepter from any noble who held it. To a king he spoke with courtesy:

"It is not fitting for you to stand like a coward.

Sit and listen. Others will hear you later."

But when he found a common man shouting, he struck him with the scepter and rebuked him:

"Friend, stay quiet and listen to those who have greater honor.

You are weak in war, and weak in counsel. No one man can rule us all. There must be one king."

The people returned from the ships.

The gathering became like a high wave breaking, then settling in its bed.

Only Thersites remained, still pouring out his unmeasured words.

He knew many shameful things, but knew no order in his speech; he loved to quarrel with kings and say whatever seemed laughable to the Argives. He was the ugliest man who came to Ilium:

bandy-legged, lame in one foot, his shoulders hunched together over his chest, and above them his pointed head was thinly covered with down. Achilles and Odysseus hated him most of all, for he was always abusing them. Now he shrilled against Agamemnon, and the Achaeans grew angry and resented him in their hearts.

He shouted loudly and reproached the shepherd of the people:

"Son of Atreus, what are you blaming now, and what do you lack?

Your huts are full of bronze, and many women are there, chosen out for you first whenever we take a city.

Do you still lack gold, some ransom a horse-taming Trojan will bring from Ilium for his son, whom I or another Achaean has bound and led away? Or a young woman, to join with her in love, whom you alone keep apart from the others? It is not fitting that the leader of our troubles should heap more trouble upon us.

Soft, shameful Achaeans, no longer men—let us sail home with our ships and leave this man here in Troy to consume his prizes, so that he may see whether we are of any use to him or not—the man who has dishonored Achilles, a far better man than he, and taken his prize for himself. Yet Achilles is not angry enough;

otherwise, son of Atreus, this would be your last outrage."

So Thersites mocked Agamemnon, shepherd of the people.
At once godlike Odysseus stood beside him and looked him down: “Thersites, reckless speaker, hold your tongue. Do not try alone to quarrel with kings. I say there is no worse mortal than you among all who came with the sons of Atreus to Ilium.
Therefore do not carry the kings’ names in your mouth, or heap insults upon them, or urge the people home.
We do not yet know how these matters will end, whether we Achaeans will return well or badly.
You sit here abusing Agamemnon,
shepherd of the people, because the heroes of the Danaans give him many gifts, and you speak by taunting. But I tell you—and this shall be fulfilled: if I find you raving again as now, let Odysseus have no head on his shoulders,
and let me no longer be called Telemachus’s father, if I do not strip your cloak and tunic, the garments that cover your shame, and send you weeping to the swift ships, beaten with disgraceful blows.” He struck his back and shoulders with the golden scepter.
Thersites bent, tears fell thickly, and a bloody welt rose beneath the scepter.
He sat trembling, wiped away the tear, and looked helplessly around.

The army, though grieved for him, laughed aloud, and one man said to another: “Odysseus has done countless good things, leading counsel and arming war;
but this is the best he has done among the Argives:
he has stopped this abusive loudmouth from insulting kings.” So the multitude spoke. Then city-sacking Odysseus rose, holding the scepter; beside him bright-eyed Athena, in the likeness of a herald, ordered the people to be silent, so that the first and last of the Achaeans might hear and understand the counsel.
Odysseus spoke thoughtfully: “Son of Atreus, the Achaeans now want to make you, their king, the most disgraced of all mortal men.
They do not fulfill the promise they made when they left Argos: that they would return after taking well-built Ilium.
They groan like young children and widowed women, each longing to go home. It is painful to stay and return after a single month away from one’s wife on a many-benched ship, when winter winds and the troubled sea hold a man in place.
But we have spent nine turning years here; I do not blame the Achaeans for grieving beside their curved ships.

Yet it is shameful to remain long and return empty-handed.

Endure, friends, and stay a little longer, until we learn whether Calchas truly prophesies or not. We know this well, and you are all witnesses who escaped the fate of death:

when the Achaean ships gathered at Aulis, carrying slaughter to Priam and the Trojans, we sacrificed perfect hecatombs beside the spring, under a beautiful plane tree where clear water ran.

There a great sign appeared. A red-backed, terrible serpent, sent into the light by Zeus himself, darted from beneath the altar and rushed to the plane tree. There were eight sparrow nestlings, young chicks huddled beneath the leaves on the highest branch; their mother was the ninth, who had hatched them.

The serpent ate them as they chirped pitifully;

the mother flew around mourning her dear young, but the serpent seized her by the wing as she cried out.

When it had eaten the chicks and their mother, the god who showed it made the serpent conspicuous, turning it to stone.

We stood astonished at what Zeus had done.

Then Calchas spoke among us, interpreting the omen:

‘Why are you silent, long-haired Achaean? Mighty Zeus has shown us this great sign, late in appearing but late to fulfill, whose glory shall never die. As the serpent ate the eight chicks and their mother, the ninth, so shall we fight here for nine years; in the tenth we shall take the broad-wayed city.’

That is what he said, and now all is being fulfilled.

Stay here, well-greaved Achaeans, until we take Priam's great city.”

He spoke, and the Argives shouted loudly; the ships roared terribly under the Achaeans' cry, praising godlike Odysseus.

Then Gerenian Nestor, the horseman, spoke:

“Shame on you—you speak like children, like infants who know nothing of the work of war. Where are our agreements and oaths now? Let our counsels and plans, our libations and right hands pledged in trust, burn in fire.

We quarrel with words and find no remedy, though we have been here long.

Agamemnon, hold the unbending counsel you had before and lead the Argives through the harsh battle.

Let those who plan apart from the Achaeans wither, one or two at a time;

their plan will not succeed. Before we return to Argos,

we must learn whether the promise of Zeus who bears the aegis was false or not. For I say that mighty Cronus's son nodded on the day we boarded our swift ships, carrying death to Troy, showing favorable signs with lightning on our right.

Let no one hurry home before he has slept beside a Trojan wife and taken vengeance for Helen's striving and groaning.

If anyone still fiercely desires to go home, let him touch his black, well-benched ship, so that he may meet death and fate before the others. And you, king, plan well and listen to another word:
sort the men by tribes and clans, Agamemnon,
so clan may help clan and tribe may help tribe.

If you do this and the Achaeans obey, you will know which leader is bad and which is good, and which common man is brave:

they will fight in their own divisions.

You will know too whether you will fail to take the city because of your men's weakness or because of their lack of knowledge in war."

Agamemnon answered him:

"Old man, you win the assembly again. If only Zeus the father,

Athena, and Apollo would give me ten counselors such as you among the Achaeans,

Priam's city would soon bow and be sacked beneath our hands.

But Zeus, son of Cronus, has given me grief: he throws me into useless quarrels and disputes.

Achilles and I fought over a girl, and I began it in anger. If we ever agree in one counsel again,

Troy's suffering will no longer be delayed, not even for a little.

Now go to dinner, so that we may join battle.

Let each man sharpen his spear well, set his shield well, feed his swift-footed horses well, and inspect his chariot carefully, so that all day we may be tested in hateful Ares.

There will be no pause, not even for a little, unless night comes to divide the force of men. The shield-strap will sweat around the chest of one man, his hand will grow weary on the spear; another's horse will sweat as he strains the polished chariot.

But whoever I see willingly lingering apart from battle

beside the curved ships will not escape the dogs and birds."

The Argives shouted loudly, like waves breaking upon a high shore when the South Wind rises and drives them against a projecting rock;

the waves never leave it, whatever wind blows from this side or that.

They rose, scattered among the ships, and kindled fires in the huts;

each man sacrificed to the everlasting gods, praying to escape death

and the labor of Ares. Agamemnon sacrificed a five-year-old, fat ox to mighty Zeus, and called the oldest and best of the Pan-Achaean:

Nestor first, then King Idomeneus; the two Ajaxes, then Tydeus's son, and sixth Odysseus, whose mind was equal to Zeus's.

Menelaus came of his own accord, for he knew in his heart how his brother labored. They stood around the ox, lifted the barley, and Agamemnon prayed:

"Most glorious and greatest Zeus, dark-clouded lord of the sky, let not the sun go down and darkness come before I cast the smoky roof of Priam's house upon its face and burn its doors with hostile fire, and tear Hector's shirt across his breast with bronze, while many of his companions fall around him face-first in the dust and bite the earth."

So he prayed, but the son of Cronus did not grant his prayer; he accepted the sacrifice, but increased the labor without end.

When they had prayed and scattered the barley, they drew back the heads, cut the throats and flayed the victim, then cut out the thighs, wrapped them in fat, and laid the raw flesh upon them.

They burned these on leafless sticks over the fire, and held the inward parts above the flame. When the thighs were burned and they had tasted the inward parts, they cut the rest into pieces, pierced them on spits, roasted them carefully, and drew away the meat.

When the labor was finished and the feast prepared, they ate; no man's heart lacked an equal portion.

When they had satisfied hunger and thirst, Gerenian Nestor, the horseman, spoke first:

"Most glorious son of Atreus, king of men, let us no longer keep speaking here or delay the work the god places in our hands.

Let the heralds summon the bronze-clad Achaeans and gather them by the ships; we will go together through the broad army and awaken sharp Ares."

So he spoke, and Agamemnon did not disobey. At once he ordered the clear-voiced heralds to proclaim battle and gather the long-haired Achaeans.

They called, and the people assembled swiftly. Around Agamemnon the god-nourished kings rushed to their places, and with them went bright-eyed Athena, bearing the precious, ageless, deathless aegis; from it hung a hundred golden tassels, each worth a hundred oxen.

With it she flashed through the Achaean ranks, urging them forward, and put an unwearied strength into every heart to fight and make war.

Then battle became sweeter to them than sailing home in their hollow ships to their dear fatherland.

As a ruinous fire blazes through an immense forest on a mountain's crest,
and its light is seen from far away, so from the bronze of the advancing host

a light rose through the air and reached heaven.

As the many tribes of winged birds—geese, cranes, or long-necked swans—fly here and there on the Asian meadow beside the streams of Cayster, settling joyfully on their wings with clamor that rings across the meadow, so the many tribes poured from ships and huts onto the Scamandrian plain.

The earth beneath their feet and horses thundered terribly.

They stood on the flowering Scamandrian plain, countless as leaves and flowers that come in their season. As countless swarms of flies wander through the shepherds' fold in spring, when milk drenches the pails, so many long-haired Achaeans stood on the plain, eager to break the Trojans.

As goatherds easily sort wide flocks of goats after they mingle in the pasture, so the leaders arranged them here and there for battle.

Agamemnon stood among them, like Zeus who delights in thunder in eyes and head, like Ares in his belt, like Poseidon in his chest.

As a bull stands conspicuous above all the cattle gathered in a herd, so Zeus made the son of Atreus conspicuous and foremost among the many heroes.

“Tell me now, Muses, who dwell in Olympian houses—

you are goddesses, present and knowing all things;

we hear only rumor and know nothing for ourselves—

who were the leaders and commanders of the Danaans?

I could not name the multitude or tell its number, not if I had ten tongues and ten mouths, an unbreakable voice, and a bronze heart within me, unless the Olympian Muses, daughters of aegis-bearing Zeus, remembered all who came to Ilium.

I will tell the leaders of the ships and all the ships themselves.”

First came the Boeotians. Peneleus and Leitus led them,

Arcesilaus, Prothoenor, Clonius beside them—

men of Hyria, rocky Aulis, Schoenus, and Scolus, of Eteon, Thespia, Graia, and broad Mycalessus,

of Harma, Eilesion, Erythrae, and Eleon,

of Hyle, Peteon, Ocalea, and well-built Medeon, of Copae, Eutresis, deep-rifted Thisbe, of Coronea, grassy Haliartus, Plataea, and Glisas; of lower Thebes, well built,

of holy Onchestus, Poseidon's shining grove, of vine-rich Arne, Mideia, sacred Nisa, and Anthedon, at the world's far edge.
Fifty ships came from them, and in each ship one hundred and twenty young Boeotians embarked.
Aspledon and Minyan Orchomenos sent their people, under Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, sons of Ares, whom Astyoche, daughter of Actor, bore to the god—the modest maiden had climbed to her upper room, and the strong god lay with her in secret.
Thirty hollow ships marched behind
them.
The Phocians were led by Schedius and Epistrophus, sons of great-hearted Iphitus, Naubolus' son;
they held Cyparissus, rocky Pytho, sacred Crisa, Daulis, Panopeus, Anemoria, and Hyampolis,
the dwellers beside divine Cephissus, and those who held Lilaea by the springs of Cephissus.
Forty black ships followed them. The Phocians formed their ranks beside the Boeotians, on the left.

Ajax, swift son of Oileus, led the Locrians—the lesser Ajax, not so great as Telamonian Ajax,
but much smaller, lightly armored, a little man;
yet with his spear he surpassed all Panhellenes and Achaeans. His men held Cynus, Opus, Calliarus, Bessa, Scarphe, lovely Augeia, Tarphe, and Thronium, around the streams of Boagrius.
Forty black ships followed the Locrians, who live beyond holy Euboea.
The Abantes held Euboea, breathless for battle:
Chalcis, Eretria, vine-rich Histiaea, Cerinthus,
the sea-cliff city of Dios, Carystus, and Styra.
Elephenor, son of Chalcodon, led
them,
great-hearted chief of the Abantes.
Behind him came the swift-haired spearmen, eager with ashwood lances to break the corslets on their enemies' chests.
Forty black ships followed them.
Those who held Athens, the city well built,
the people of great-hearted Erechtheus—whom Athena, daughter of Zeus, once raised, and the grain-giving earth bore, then set within her rich temple in Athens, where Athenian youths appease him with bulls and lambs as the years turn—were led by Menestheus, son of Peteus.

No man on earth could equal him in ordering horses and shielded men for battle; only Nestor,
older by birth, contended with him.
Fifty black ships followed. Ajax brought twelve from Salamis
and stationed them beside the Athenian ranks.
The men of Argos held Tiryns with its walls, Hermione and Asine deep in their bay, Troezene, Epidaurus thick with vines, Ægina, Mases, and the Achaean shore.
Diomedes, strong in battle, led them, with Sthenelus, beloved son of famous Capaneus, and Euryalus, godlike, son of king Mecisteus, son of Talaus. Diomedes led them all.
Eighty black ships followed.
The men of Mycenae, the well-built city, came too, of wealthy Corinth and well-built Cleonae, of Orneia, lovely Aretbyrea, and Sicyon, where Adrastus first reigned, and of Hyperesia, high Gonoessa, Pellene, Ægium, and the shore all along Aegialus, around broad Helice.

Agamemnon, son of Atreus, led one hundred ships;
with him came the most numerous and best of the people.
He himself put on the flashing bronze and shone, conspicuous among the heroes, since he was best and led a people far more numerous than the rest.
The men of hollow Lacedaemon came, of Pharis, Sparta, Messa, Bryseiae, lovely Augeiae, Amyclae, Helos, the city by the sea, Laas, and Oetylus. Menelaus, his brother,
led them—strong in battle—with sixty ships.
They formed apart; he went among them trusting his own courage, urging the war, for most of all his heart desired to avenge Helen's distress and tears.
The Pylia people held Pylos and lovely Arene, Thryon at the ford of Alpheius, well-built Epi, Cyprisiseis, Amphigenia, Pteleos, Helos, and Dorion, where the Muses met Thamyris the Thracian, coming from Oechalia, from Eurytus of Oechalia;

he boasted that he would defeat the Muses themselves if they, the daughters of Zeus who bears the aegis, should sing. Angered, they blinded him and stripped him of his wondrous song, making him forget the lyre.
Gerenian horseman Nestor led them; ninety hollow ships marched in his wake.
The Arcadians held the steep mountain under Cyllene, by the tomb of Aepytus, where men fight at close quarters; Pheneus, many-sheeped Orchomenos, Ripe, Stratia, windy Enispe, Tegea, lovely Mantineia, Stymphalus, and Parrhasia.
Agapenor, son of Ancaeus, led them in sixty ships. Agamemnon himself,
son of Atreus, supplied the strong-benched vessels, for the Arcadians knew nothing of the sea;
they embarked in them to cross the wine-dark water, many Arcadian men in every ship, skilled in war.
The men of Buprasium and divine Elis inhabited the land from Hyrmene to Myrsinus at its edge, from the Olenian rock to Alesium enclosed within.
Four leaders held them; ten swift ships followed each, and many Epeans embarked.

Amphimachus and Thalpius led two divisions, sons respectively of Cteatus and Eurytus, the Actorian pair; mighty Diores, son of Amarynceus, led the third, and godlike Polyxenus, son of Agasthenes, son of Augeias, led the fourth.
From Dulichium and the sacred Echinades islands, which lie beyond the sea opposite Elis, came the people.
Meges, equal to Ares, led them—son of Phyleus, beloved of Zeus, the horseman.
Phyleus had once left Dulichium in anger with his father.
Forty black ships followed Meges.
Odysseus led the great-hearted Cephalenians,
who held Ithaca, forest-shaking Neritum, rough Ægilipa, Zacynthus, Crocylea, and Asteria, and who held the mainland opposite.
Odysseus, equal to Zeus in counsel, commanded them;
twelve red-cheeked ships followed.
Thoas, son of Andraemon, led the Aetolians.
They held Pleuron, Olenus, Pyléné, sea-near Chalcis, and rocky Calydon. The sons of great Oeneus were gone, and Oeneus himself was gone; blond Meleager had died.
So Thoas had been charged to rule all the Aetolians.

Forty black ships followed him.
Idomeneus, famous with the spear, led the Cretans.
They held Cnossus, well-walled Gortyna, Lyctus, Miletus, bright Lycastus, Phaestus, and Rhytium, well-inhabited cities, and all who held Crete,
the land of a hundred cities.
Idomeneus led them.
Meriones, equal to Enyalios the slayer, stood beside him; eighty black ships followed the Cretan leaders.
Tlepolemus, Heracles' tall and noble
son, brought nine ships from Rhodes. The Rhodians lived in three divisions—Lindus, Ialysus, and shining Camirus.
Tlepolemus, famous with the spear, was born to Heracles and Astyoche, whom Heracles brought from Ephyra, after sacking the cities of the god-reared people.
When Tlepolemus had grown in his great house, he killed his father's aged maternal uncle, Licymnius, an offshoot of Ares. He built ships at once, gathered a great people, and fled across the sea, for Heracles' other sons and grandsons threatened him.
After suffering much, he reached Rhodes, and settled there in three tribes; Zeus, lord of gods and men, loved them and poured great wealth upon them.

Nireus brought three equal ships from Syme—Nireus, son of Aglaia and King Charopus,
the fairest man to come beneath Ilium after Peleus' son; but he was weak, and few followed
him.
The men of Nisyros, Crapathus, Casus, and Cos, the city of Eurypylus, and the Calydnian islands, were led by Pheidippus and Antiphus, two sons of Thessalus, Heracles' royal son.
Thirty hollow ships marched behind them.
Those who held Pelasgian Argos—Alos, Alope, and Trachis, Phthia and lovely Hellas—were called Myrmidons, Hellenes, and Achaeans. Achilles led their fifty ships, but they did not remember the harsh battle: no one was there to lead them into line. Swift-footed, godlike Achilles lay beside the ships, angry over fair-haired Briseis, whom he had taken from Lyrnessus after much toil, when he sacked Lyrnessus and the walls of Thebes, and killed Mynes and Epistrophus, spear-famed sons of King Evenus, Selepius' son. There he lay in grief,

but soon he would rise.
Those who held Phylace, flowery Pyrasus, Demeter's precinct, Iton, mother of sheep, Antron by the sea, and meadowed Pteleon, were led by warlike Protesilaus while he lived; now the black earth held him. His wife, tearing her cheeks, was left in Phylace, and his house stood unfinished: a Dardanian killed him as he leapt first from his ship.
Nor were his people leaderless, though they longed for him; Podarces, son of Iphiclus, rich in sheep, led them, Protesilaus' own brother, younger by birth. Yet Protesilaus had been first and better. Forty black ships followed.
Those who held Pherae beside Lake Boebe, Boebe, Glaphyrae, and well-built Iolcus were led by Eumelus, dear son of Admetus, whom Alcestis, fairest of Pelias' daughters, bore to Admetus.
Eleven ships followed him.
Those who held Methone, Thaumacia, Meliboea, and rough Olizon were led by Philoctetes, skilled with the bow, in seven ships; fifty oarsmen, skilled in war, embarked in each. But Philoctetes lay on Lemnos, suffering cruel pain from a deadly serpent's wound, where the sons of the Achaeans had left him. There he lay in anguish; soon the Argives by the ships would remember their lord Philoctetes. Nor were his men leaderless: Medon, Oileus' bastard son, whom Rhene bore to the sacker of cities, arranged them. Seven ships followed.

Those who held Tricca, rocky Ithome, and Oechalia, the city of Eurytus of Oechalia, were led by the two sons of Asclepius, good physicians, Podalirius and Machaon.
Thirty hollow ships followed. Those who held Ormenius, the spring of Hypereia, Asteria, and the white peaks of Titanus were led by Euryphylus, glorious son of Euaemon, in forty black ships.
Those who held Argissa, Gyrtone, Orthe, Elone, and white Oloosson were led by city-sacker Polypoetes, son of Pirithous, whom immortal Zeus fathered through Hippodameia on the day the Lapiths punished the shaggy Centaurs and drove them from Pelion among the Aethices. With him came Leonteus, an offshoot of Ares, son of the great-hearted Coronus, son of Caeneus. Forty black ships followed.
Guneus brought twenty-two ships from Cyphus; the warlike Enienes and Perrhaebians followed him, those who made their homes around wintry Dodona, and those who worked beside lovely Titaesius, whose clear water runs to Peneius but never mingles with him—it flows above him like oil, for it is a branch of Styx's oath.

Prothous, son of Tenthredon, led the Magnetes, who lived beside Peneius and forest-shaking Pelion.
Swift Prothous commanded them; forty black ships followed.
These were the leaders and lords of the Danaans. Now, Muse, tell me who among them was best—the men themselves and the horses that followed the sons of Atreus. The best horses were those of Eumelus, swift as birds, alike in age and color, mares whom Apollo of the silver bow had bred in Pieria, carrying the terror of Ares. Of men, Telamonian Ajax was best while Achilles nursed his anger—for Achilles was far better, and his were the horses that bore the blameless son of Peleus.
But Achilles lay in his sea-going ships, angry with Agamemnon; his people played beside the water with discus, javelins, and bows, while the horses stood by their chariots grazing lotus and marsh celery.
The chariots lay covered in the tents, and the men, longing for their war-loving leader, wandered through the camp and did not fight.

They moved like a fire sweeping across the whole earth; the ground groaned beneath their feet, as when thunder-loving Zeus, angry at Typhoeus, lashes the earth around Arima, where they say Typhoeus has his bed. So the earth groaned beneath their feet, and they crossed the plain swiftly.
Swift-footed Iris came to the Trojans as a messenger from Zeus who bears the aegis, carrying a grievous message.
They were speaking in assembly at Priam's gates, young and old gathered together. Iris stood near,
took the voice of Polites, Priam's son—the swift scout who sat atop old Aesyetes' highest tomb, watching for the Achaeans to depart from their ships—and spoke: “Old man, your speeches are always
dear to you,
as in peacetime; but war without respite has risen.
I have entered many battles, yet never saw such a people, so many, moving across the plain, like leaves or grains of sand, to fight before the city.
Hector, I charge you above all: do this.
Many allies dwell throughout Priam's great city, and many tongues belong to these scattered peoples.

Let each commander signal those he rules, and marshal his own citizens and lead them out.”
So she spoke, and Hector understood the goddess.
He swiftly dissolved the assembly.
The gates opened wide;
the people poured out, footmen and horsemen, and a great tumult rose.
Before the city stood a steep, isolated, rounded hill, which men called Batieia, but immortals knew as the tomb of leaping Myrine. There the Trojans and their allies formed apart.
Great Hector, crested in bronze, led
the Trojans;
with him, by far the greatest and best of the armed people, eager with their spears. Aeneas, noble son of Anchises, led the Dardanians—Aphrodite bore him to Anchises in the folds of Ida, when the goddess lay with a mortal.
He was not alone: Antenor’s two sons, Archelochus and Acamas, who knew every art of war, stood beside him.
The Trojans of Zeleia, rich and drinking the dark water of the Aesepus beneath Ida’s lowest foot, followed Pandarus, glorious son of Lycaon, to whom Apollo himself gave the bow.
Adrastus and Amphius, lightly armored sons of Merops of Percote, led those who held Adrasteia, Apaesus, Pityeia, and steep Mount Tereia.

Merops knew prophecy better than any man and forbade his sons to enter the death-bringing war, but the black Fates drove them on.
Those who held Percote, Practius, Sestus, Abydos,
and divine Arisba were led by Asius, son of Hyrtacides—Asius whom great, fiery horses brought from Arisba, beside the stream of Selleis.
Hippothous and Pyleus, offshoots of Ares and sons of Pelasgian Lethus, led the spear-famed Pelasgians who dwelt in deep-soiled Larisa.
Acamas and hero Pirous led the Thracians held within the rushing Hellespont; Euphemus, son of Troezenus and of Ceyx, led the spearmen of the Cicones. Pirechmes brought the Paeonians, their crooked bows, from distant Amydon beside broad Axios, whose fairest water spreads across the land.
Great-hearted Pylaemenes led the Paphlagonians from Eneti, where the race of wild asses is born; from Cytorus and Sesamus, from their houses beside the Parthenius, from Cromna, Aegialus, and the high Erythini.
Odus and Epistrophus led the Halizonians from distant Alybe, birthplace of silver.

Chromis and Ennomus the augur led the Mysians;
but augury could not save Ennomus from black death: swift-footed Aeacides struck him down in the river, where Achilles was slaughtering Trojans and their allies.
Phorcys and godlike Ascanius led the Phrygians,
come from far-off Ascania, eager for battle.
Mesthles and Antiphus, sons of Talaemenes, whom the Gygaean lake bore, led the Maionians born beneath Tmolus. Nastes led the Carians, barbarous-speaking men from Miletus, Mount Phthira, the banks of Maeander, and the steep peaks of Mycale.
Amphimachus and Nastes, splendid sons of Nomion, led them. Nastes went to war wearing gold, like a girl, a foolishness that could not ward off his grievous death; swift-footed Aeacides killed him in the river, and discerning Achilles carried off his gold.
Sarpedon and blameless Glaucus led the Lycians, come from far Lycia, from the whirling Xanthus.

Source range: Book 2. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — The false dream and mustering of the Achaean host Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; new generated composition informed by the repository's Blake-informed visual direction, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 3

First-pass working translation

When each host had taken its place beside its leaders, the Trojans came with shouting, with a clamor, as cranes that flee before the winter weather, the measureless rain, and fly above the Ocean, crying, and bearing death to little
men,
the Pygmies; high in air they wage their quarrel.
The Achaeans moved in silence, breathing courage, resolved in heart to stand for one another.
As when the South Wind pours a mist upon the mountain peaks—unwelcome to the shepherd, yet better than the night for one who steals, whose sight reaches no farther than a stone—
so rose the dust beneath their feet, and swiftly they crossed the plain.
When they had drawn together, godlike Alexander stood before the Trojan ranks, clothed in leopard skin, with bow curved, and sword; he brandished two spears of bronze, and challenged every Argive champion.

When war-loving Menelaus saw him striding before the host, he rejoiced as a lion rejoices when he discovers a great carcass—a horned stag, or wild goat—and hunger drives him to feed, though hounds run after him, and young hunters.
So Menelaus rejoiced to see his enemy;
he thought to punish the man who had wronged him, and leapt at once from his chariot, armed.
But when godlike Alexander saw him among the champions, his heart was struck with fear; he withdrew among his people, shunning death. As when a man sees a serpent in a mountain cleft, and steps backward, while trembling seizes all his limbs, and pallor spreads over both his cheeks, so he sank again among the proud Trojans, afraid of Atreus' son.
Then Hector saw him, and rebuked
him: “Paris, handsome beyond measure, mad for women, deceiver—would you had never been born, or died unmarried!
That were my prayer, and better far than this:
to be a public shame, a common reproach.

The long-haired Achaeans surely laugh at you, and call you champion because your face is fair, though there is no strength within your heart, no courage. Was it as such a man that you crossed the sea in ships, gathered
companions,
mingled with strangers, and carried away a beautiful woman from a distant land, your father's grief, your city's, and all the people's—a joy to foes, but shame to you? Will you not stand before war-loving Menelaus, and learn the man whose young wife you keep? Your lyre will not avail, nor Aphrodite's gifts, your hair, your looks, when you are lying in the dust. The Trojans fear you;
for all your evil you would already wear a tunic made of stone.” Godlike Alexander answered: “Hector, you have rebuked me with justice, not beyond it; your heart is hard and tireless, like an axe that a skilled workman drives through a ship's timber, adding strength to every stroke. So is the mind within your breast.

But do not cast against me the lovely gifts of golden Aphrodite; the glorious gifts
the gods bestow cannot be cast away, nor can a man choose them according to his will.
If you desire that I should fight, then bid the other Trojans and Achaeans sit
down;
set Menelaus and me between the hosts, to fight for Helen and her possessions.
Let the better man, the stronger, take the woman and all the goods, and lead them to his home;
the rest shall cut a faithful covenant, and dwell in fertile Troy, while they return to horse-breeding Argos and Achaëa.”
Hector rejoiced to hear this speech.
He went into the midst and halted the Trojan ranks, gripping his spear by the middle. The long-haired Achaeans bent their bows, and aimed their stones; but Agamemnon cried aloud: “Hold, Argives! Do not shoot, young Achaeans. Hector of the shining crest claims that he will speak.” They ceased from fighting and fell silent. Hector spoke between the hosts:

“Hear me, Trojans and well-greaved Achaean; hear the word of Alexander, for whose sake this quarrel rose.
Let all the others lay their beautiful armor
upon the earth; let him and war-loving Menelaus alone fight in the midst for Helen and all her possessions. Whoever wins, and proves the stronger, let him take all the goods and take the woman home;
the rest of us shall cut a bond of friendship.”
He spoke, and all were silent.
Menelaus answered: “Hear me as well. Above all else, the pain reaches my heart. I think the Argives now and Trojans should be parted, for you have suffered enough because of my quarrel and Alexander’s.
Let him for whom death and fate are fashioned die;
let all the rest be parted quickly.
Bring two lambs, one white, one black, for Earth and Sun, and a dark boar for Zeus. Bring mighty Priam, that he himself may cut the oath, for his sons are insolent and faithless; lest the transgression of one man destroy the covenant of Zeus. The minds of youth are ever shifting; an elder sees before and also after, that his counsel may be best for either side.”

The Trojans and Achaeans rejoiced, hoping to end the wretched war. They drew back their horses, dismounted, stripped their armor, and set it down close together, with little space between.
Hector sent two heralds toward the city to fetch the lambs and call Priam; Agamemnon sent Talthybius to the hollow ships to bring a lamb.
Talthybius did not disobey the godlike king.
Then Iris came, a messenger, to white-armed Helen, in likeness of Laodice, fairest daughter of Priam, wife of Antenor’s son, Helicaon.
She found her in the chamber, weaving a great double-folded purple cloth, and on it working the many labors of the horse-taming Trojans
and bronze-clad Achaeans—the griefs they suffered for Helen at the hands of Ares.
Swift-footed Iris said: “Come, dear bride, and see the deeds of the Trojans and bronze-clad Achaeans, those who once bore tearful Ares against each other upon the hateful field, greedy for war.

Now they sit in silence by their shields;
their long spears stand planted.
Alexander
and war-loving Menelaus will fight for you with long spears; the victor will call you his beloved wife.”
So the goddess stirred in Helen’s heart desire for her first husband, city, and her parents.
At once she veiled herself in shining linen, and left the chamber, shedding tender tears;
she was not alone, for two attendants
followed,
Aethra, daughter of Pittheus, and ox-eyed Clymene.
Soon they reached the Scaean Gates.
Around Priam sat Panthous, Thymoetes, Lampus, Clytius, Hicetaon, scion of Ares, Ucalegon, and wise Antenor—the elders of the city, released by age from war, but excellent speakers, like cicadas in the forest, perched in trees, and sending forth their lily-clear voices.
Such were the Trojan leaders on the tower.

When they saw Helen coming on the wall, they murmured: “There is no blame if Trojans and well-greaved Achaeans suffer long for such a woman.
Terribly she resembles an immortal goddess. Yet let her go in the ships,
and not remain a grief to us and to our children.” Priam called Helen by name: “Come here, dear child, and sit before me, that you may show me now your former husband, kinsmen, and your friends.
You are not blameworthy in my eyes;
the gods
are blameworthy, who brought this tearful war upon the Achaeans. Tell me of that
man, that enormous Achaean, strong and tall.
Some are taller in the head, but never have I seen one so stately; he resembles a king.” Helen, divine among women, answered: “You are worthy of honor, and dreadful to me, father-in-law.
Would evil death had pleased me when I followed your son here, leaving chamber, kin, my child, and my beloved companions. But it did not;
therefore I waste away in tears. I will tell you whom you ask about. That is Atreus' son,

wide-ruling Agamemnon, a good king
and mighty spearman; once he was my brother-in-law."
The old man marveled: "Happy Atreus' son,
born under fortunate stars, and greatly blessed!
Many sons of the Achaeans obey your word.
Once I entered vine-rich Phrygia, and saw the greatest host of Phrygian men, with horses of dappled hide—the armies of Otreus and godlike Mygdon, camped beside the banks of Sangarius. I too was counted there among their allies, on the day the Amazons came;
but even they were not so many as these bright-eyed Achaeans." Then the old man saw Odysseus:
"Tell me, dear child, of this man. He is shorter in head than Atreus' son, but broader in shoulders and in chest. His armor lies on the earth, while through the ranks he moves like a ram among a great flock of white sheep."
Helen, daughter of Zeus, answered:
"That is Laertes' son, many-counseled Odysseus, raised in rocky Ithaca, skilled in every kind of trick and close-woven counsel." Wise Antenor replied: "Woman, your word is wholly true.

Once divine Odysseus came here with Menelaus, war-loving, as your embassy. I received them within my house, and learned the nature of both, their close counsel. Among the gathered Trojans Menelaus surpassed him in the breadth of shoulder; but when they sat, Odysseus was more majestic.
When they wove their speeches and their plans, Menelaus spoke with speed, in few words, but very clearly, since he was younger still.
When many-counseled Odysseus rose, he stood with eyes fixed on the ground, and held the scepter neither before nor behind him, but upright, like one unskilled in public speech—you might have called him angry, and foolish. Yet when he sent his great voice from his chest, and words like winter snow, no mortal could contend with him; we no longer marveled at his form."
The old man saw Ajax and asked:
"Who is that other Achaean, so strong and tall, the foremost of the Argives in head and broad shoulders?" Helen, trailing her robe, answered: "That is towering Ajax, the bulwark of the Achaeans. On the other side stands Idomeneus among the Cretans, like a god; around him gather all the Cretan leaders.

Often war-loving Menelaus welcomed him within our house, when he came from Crete.
I see the other bright-eyed Achaeans, whom I could recognize and name; but I cannot see the two commanders of the people, Castor, breaker of horses,
and Polydeuces, good with the fists—my brothers, born from the same mother as I.
Either they came not with lovely Lacedaemon's army, or else they came here in the ships, but will not enter
battle, fearing the shame and all the reproaches that are mine." So she spoke; but the life-giving earth already held them in Lacedaemon, their dear native land.
At last Idaeus brought the victims from the city.
Priam climbed down, and Agamemnon met him there between the lines. The heralds gathered up the oath-gifts of the gods; they mixed the wine within the bowl, and poured it over the hands of the kings. Agamemnon drew the knife that hung beside his great sword, and cut the lambs' hair;

the Trojan and Achaean heralds bore it out among the leaders. Atreus' son raised his hands and prayed:
"Father Zeus, most glorious and greatest, lord of Ida; Sun, seeing and hearing all things;
rivers and earth;
and you beneath, who punish among the dead
whoever swears falsely—be witnesses, and guard this faithful oath. If Alexander kills Menelaus, let him keep Helen and her possessions, and let us turn again in our seafaring
ships.
But if golden-haired Menelaus kills Alexander,
let the Trojans return Helen and her possessions,
and pay the Argives honor, such as shall be remembered among men yet to come. If Priam and his sons refuse to pay the honor due me when Alexander falls, then I will stay, and fight on for recompense, until the war has reached its end.” He cut the lambs’ and the boar’s throats with pitiless bronze, and laid them on the earth; they gasped as metal took their strength. Then from the bowl they drew the wine into the cups, and poured it forth, praying to the gods who live forever.

Someone
among the Trojans and Achaeans spoke:
“Father Zeus, most glorious and greatest, and you, all other gods—whichever side first shall harm this oath, may their brains be poured upon the ground, as this wine, their own and their children’s; and may their wives be taken by other men.”
So they spoke, but Cronus’ son did not yet fulfill the prayer. Dardanian Priam addressed them:
“Hear me, Trojans and well-greaved
Achaeans.
I go again to windy Ilium; I cannot bear with my own eyes to see my dear son fight war-loving Menelaus. Zeus and the immortals
know which of these two has been assigned to death.”
He set the lambs within the chariot, mounted,
and drew the reins; Antenor climbed beside him,

and they drove toward Ilium.
Hector, son of Priam, and brilliant Odysseus
first measured out the ground. Then they shook the lots within a bronze-studded helmet, to learn which man should cast his bronze spear first.
The people prayed, raising their hands to heaven: “Father Zeus, lord of Ida, most glorious and greatest, grant that the man who brought these deeds upon both peoples may die, and enter Hades’ house, while friendship and faithful oaths become ours.”
Hector shook the helmet and looked back; Paris’ lot leapt forth first. The men sat in their ranks,
where each man’s horses and bright armor lay.
Godlike Alexander, husband of fair-haired Helen, put on his armor: first the beautiful greaves, with silver clasps about the ankles; then the breastplate of his brother Lycaon, fitted to his body;
around his shoulders he hung the bronze sword,
with silver studs, and then the great, heavy shield.
Upon his head he set the well-made horsehair helmet, its crest nodding terribly above him, and took the mighty spear that fitted to his palm.

Menelaus armed himself in the same manner.
They came from either side into the space between the armies, looking terribly at one another;
wonder seized Trojans and Achaeans alike.
They stood close, measuring the ground, and shook their spears in anger. Paris cast first his spear, long-shadowed, striking Atreus' son's shield;
the bronze did not break through, but its point bent within the strong shield. Menelaus, son of Atreus,
prayed, and cast his own:
"Father Zeus, grant that I may punish Alexander,
who first wronged me; subdue him beneath my hands, so that a man unborn may tremble to do evil to one who offers friendship as a guest-friend."
He hurled the long-shadowed spear.
It struck the shield of Priam's son, passed through the shining metal, and lodged within the elaborate corselet;
it tore the tunic by his flank, but Paris bent

aside, and escaped the black Fates.
Atreus' son
drew forth his silver-studded sword, and struck the helmet's crest. Around the helmet the blade broke into three and four pieces, and fell from his hand.
He groaned, and looked into the broad sky:
"Father Zeus, no god is more destructive than you.
I thought to punish Alexander for his evil, but now the sword has shattered in my hands, and the spear flew useless from my palm."
He sprang forward, seized the horsehair of Paris' helmet, and dragged him round toward the
well-greaved Achaeans.
The embroidered chin-strap beneath his throat was strangling him; and he would have dragged him off, winning immeasurable glory, but Aphrodite,
the daughter of Zeus, saw it and broke the strap with force like an ox slaughtered for sacrifice.
The empty helmet followed Menelaus' strong hand; he whirled it, and threw it among the Achaeans,
and his faithful companions carried it away.
Menelaus rushed again, eager to kill with bronze,

but Aphrodite, lightly as a goddess, snatched Paris away, wrapped him in a dense mist,
and set him down within his fragrant chamber,
filled with incense.
Aphrodite went again to call white-armed Helen.
She found her on the high tower, surrounded by many Trojan women. Taking the form of an old woman, a spinner who had lived beside Helen in Lacedaemon, and whom she loved,
the goddess
shook her fragrant robe, and spoke: “Come here.
Alexander calls you home. He lies within his chamber, upon the turned bed, shining in beauty and dress.
You would not think he had come from fighting a man, but from a dance, or from sitting down after the dance.” The goddess stirred desire within her
heart.
When Helen saw her lovely throat, her longing breast, and flashing eyes, she marveled, and named her: “Strange woman, why do you long to deceive me?
Will you carry me farther to some city rich in people—Phrygia, or lovely Maeonia—if another mortal man is dear to you there? Menelaus has defeated godlike Alexander, and would lead hateful me home.

Is that why you stand here, weaving deceit?
Go sit beside him yourself; leave the gods’ road, and do not turn your feet toward Olympus again.
Worry over him always, till he makes you his wife, or else your slave. I will not go to
him;
it would be shameful to tend his bed.
Each Trojan woman would reproach me. I carry griefs without number within my heart.”
Golden Aphrodite answered in anger: “Do not provoke me, wretched woman, lest I leave you in my anger.
I will make you hated as terribly as I have loved you, and set a hateful enmity between Trojans and Danaans; you shall perish in an evil fate.” Helen, daughter of Zeus, was afraid.
She went in silence, veiled in bright linen, seen by none of all the Trojan women, and the goddess led her.
When they reached Alexander’s beautiful house, the attendants turned at once to their work.
Helen entered the high-roofed chamber. Smiling

Aphrodite brought a chair, and set it opposite Alexander. Helen sat, turned away her eyes,
and rebuked her husband: “You have come back from war.
Would you had perished there, conquered by the strong man who was once my husband!
You boasted that you were better than war-loving Menelaus in strength, and hands, and spear. Go challenge him again; but I tell you, do not meet him face to face, lest soon his spear bring you down.” Paris answered: “Do not wound my heart with harsh reproaches.
Menelaus defeated me with Athena at his side;
another time I shall defeat him, for
the gods
are with us. Come, let us turn to love, and lie together.
Never before has desire so wrapped my mind—not even when first I carried you away from lovely Lacedaemon in seafaring ships, and joined with you in love and bed upon Cranae’s island. So now I love you, and sweet longing takes hold of me.” He went first to the bed, and his wife followed.
They slept within the bed’s perforated frame, while Atreus’ son went prowling through the host like a wild beast, seeking Alexander.

No Trojan,
no famous ally, could point him out.
No one hid him from love—he was hateful to them all, as hateful as black death. Agamemnon called across the ranks:
“Hear me, Trojans, Dardanians, and allies: victory plainly belongs to war-loving Menelaus. Give up Argive Helen, and all the possessions with her,
and pay the honor due—an honor that shall remain among men yet to come.”
So Atreus’ son spoke, and the other
Achaeans
applauded him.

Source range: Book 3. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Helen upon the walls of Troy with the Trojan elders Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's Blake-informed visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 4

First-pass working translation

The gods sat beside Zeus, and held their council upon the golden floor. Among them Hebe, royal, poured nectar; in golden cups they took it, looking toward the city of Priam.
The son of Cronus sought to provoke Hera,
and spoke with cutting words: “Two goddesses have helped Menelaus—Hera of Argos,
and Athena of Alalcomenae. They sit apart,
and rejoice; but smiling Aphrodite always stands near him, and wards the Fates
away.
Even now she saved him when he thought to die.
Yet victory belongs to war-loving Menelaus.
Come, let us consider what shall now be done:
shall we stir dreadful war again, or set friendship between the peoples? If this were pleasing to all, Priam’s city might remain inhabited, and Menelaus lead Argive Helen home.”
Athena sat apart, her anger held within her,

and fierce resentment burned against her father.

Hera could not contain her anger: “Most terrible son of Cronus, what have you said?
Would you make my labor fruitless—the sweat I spent in toil, while my horses were worn out gathering the people for Priam and his sons? Do it; but none of the gods will praise you.” Cloud-gathering Zeus answered in displeasure: “Strange woman, what have Priam
and his sons
done to you, that you rage without rest to destroy well-built Ilium? If you could enter through the gates and walls, and devour Priam, his sons, and all the Trojans raw, your anger might be healed.
Do as you wish; but let this quarrel between us not grow into a greater strife. I say this too: when I desire to destroy a city where your people live, do not delay my anger; let me act.
For I gave way to you, though unwillingly.
Of all the cities beneath the sun and starry sky, holy Ilium, Priam, and his well-speared people were most dear to me. Never did my altar lack its equal feast, libation, or savor of sacrifice; that honor was our portion.” Ox-eyed Hera replied: “Three cities are most dear to me—Argos, Sparta, and broad-wayed Mycenae. Destroy them when they anger you; I will not stand before you, nor begrudge it. But do not make my labor fruitless. I too am a goddess, born from the same source as you; Cronus of crooked counsel bore me eldest, and I am called your wife, while you rule among the immortals. Let us yield to one another, you to me, and I to you; the other gods will follow. Now command Athena to go swiftly into the battle, the grievous battle of Trojans and Achaeans, and see whether the Trojans will first harm the illustrious Achaeans, breaking the oaths.” Her father, father of the gods, did not disobey. He spoke his winged words to Athena: “Go swiftly among the Trojans and Achaeans; see whether the Trojans will first harm the illustrious Achaeans, breaking the oaths.” So he urged Athena, already eager. She shot down from Olympus’ peaks, like the bright star that Cronus’ son sends forth as a sign to sailors, or a mighty army, from which innumerable sparks leap into the dark. In its likeness Pallas Athena rushed to earth, and sprang into the midst. Wonder seized the Trojans and well-greaved Achaeans; each man said to the man beside him: “Will dreadful war rise again, or will Zeus establish friendship between the peoples?” Athena entered the Trojan crowd in the likeness of Laodocus, son of Antenor, a strong spearman, seeking godlike Pandarus. She found Lycaon’s son, blameless and powerful, standing among the dense ranks of shield-bearing men who had followed him from the streams of Aesepus. Standing near, she spoke: “Would you obey me, Lycaon’s son? Would you dare to shoot a swift arrow at Menelaus? You would win the favor and glory of all the Trojans, above all of King Alexander. He would first give shining gifts if he saw Menelaus, son of Atreus, struck by your arrow, and climbing to the grievous pyre.

Shoot glorious Menelaus; vow to Apollo, famous archer of Lycia, that when you return to sacred Zeleia you will sacrifice a splendid hecatomb of first-born lambs.”
The goddess won the foolish man.
He took down his polished bow, made from the horns of a wild goat that he himself had struck beneath the breast, as it sprang from the rock; the animal fell backward upon the stone. Its horns were sixteen palms in length.
A horn-worker joined and polished them, and set a golden tip upon them. Pandarus laid the bow down, while his excellent companions held their shields before him, lest the warlike sons of
the Achaeans
leap forth before Menelaus was struck.
He opened the lid of his quiver, and drew an arrow not yet shot, the source of black pain.
Quickly
he fitted the bitter arrow to the string, and vowed again to Apollo. He drew together the notch and ox-hide cord; the great bow bent in a circle, twanged, the string cried aloud, and the sharp arrow leapt through the host, eager to fly.

Yet the blessed gods had not forgotten you, Menelaus.
First Athena, the spoil-taking daughter of Zeus, stood before you, and turned aside the deadly arrow, as a mother brushes a fly from her sleeping child.
She guided it to the place where the golden clasps held fast the belt, where the double breastplate met.
The bitter arrow struck the fitted belt, passed through the decorated belt and elaborate
corselet,
and pierced the guard that kept the skin from spears—the guard that saved him most; yet the arrow passed beyond it, and grazed his flesh. Dark blood at once ran from the wound. As a Maeonian or Carian woman stains ivory with purple, to adorn a horse's cheek—kept in a chamber, desired by many riders, an ornament and glory for horse and charioteer—
so well-formed thighs and beautiful legs, Menelaus, were stained with blood.
When Agamemnon saw the dark blood from the wound, he trembled; war-loving Menelaus trembled too, but when he saw the sinew and arrow-barbs outside, his heart gathered itself again.

Agamemnon groaned, holding Menelaus' hand, while his companions lamented:
"Dear brother, I cut the oath that set you alone before the Achaeans to fight the Trojans;
and now the Trojans have struck you, and trampled the faithful oath. Yet oath, lambs' blood, libations unmixed, and the right hands we trusted shall not be vain. Though Olympus' lord does not fulfill it at once, he will fulfill it later; and they shall pay dearly, with heads, wives, and children. I know within my heart the day shall come when holy Ilium, Priam, and Priam's well-speared people are destroyed; when Zeus himself, dwelling in the upper air, shakes his dark aegis over them in anger at this deceit.
These things shall not fail; but my grief for you, Menelaus, will be terrible if you die, and fulfill the appointed end of life." Menelaus answered: "Take heart, and do not alarm the army. The wound is not deadly; the arrow's point did not remain, and belt and corselet held it back."
Agamemnon summoned Talthybius:
"Call Machaon,

son of Asclepius, the blameless healer, to see whether he can heal Menelaus." Talthybius passed through the ranks, and found Machaon, good physician, among the shield-bearing men who followed him from Tricca. He brought him before Menelaus.
Machaon cut away the shining belt, corselet, and guard;
he drew the clotted blood out of the wound,
and laid soothing medicines upon it—medicines once given by Cheiron to his father, Asclepius.
When the Trojans' ranks came on again, no one could see divine Agamemnon sleeping, shrinking from the fight, or refusing it. He hurried to the battle that gives men glory. He left his horses and bronze-decorated chariot apart, in care of Eurymedon, son of Peiraeus, son of Ptolemy, charging him to bring them near when weariness should seize his limbs, after commanding so many. On foot he moved among the ranks;
whomever he saw eager, he stood beside and encouraged:
"Argives, do not let your fierce courage slacken.
Father Zeus will not help a lie. Those who first harmed

the oath shall have their tender flesh devoured by vultures, while we shall carry wives and children aboard the ships, when we have taken the city.”
But those he saw shrinking from the hateful war he rebuked: “Argives, soft with arrows, objects of shame! Do you not respect yourselves? Why stand amazed like fawns that, after running over a great plain, stand still, their courage gone? Will you wait for
the Trojans
to come close to the ships drawn stern-first beside the gray sea, and see whether Cronus’ son will extend his hand above you?” So he went through the ranks, and came among the Cretans.
They armed around wise Idomeneus.
Idomeneus stood in the front ranks, like a boar in
strength, while Meriones urged the rearward lines. Agamemnon rejoiced to see them, and spoke gently to Idomeneus: “Idomeneus, I honor you above the swift Achaeans, in war, in every work, and at the feast, when the best of the Argives mix the bright wine within the bowl.
Though other long-haired Achaeans drink their portion, your cup stands full, as mine does, to drink whenever your heart commands. Rise to war, as you have always claimed that you would.”

The Cretan leader answered: “Atreus’ son, I shall remain your faithful companion, as I first promised and nodded.
Urge the other long-haired Achaeans on, that we may fight at once. The Trojans have spilled the oaths, and death and grief shall follow them, since they first damaged the covenant.”
Agamemnon passed on gladly and came to the two Ajaxes.
They armed themselves, and a dense cloud of footmen followed.
As when a goatherd sees from a watchpoint a cloud coming over the sea under the West Wind’s sound—black as pitch from far away, bringing a mighty storm, and he shudders and drives the sheep into a cave—so the dark, shield-and-spear-bristling ranks moved with the divinely reared young men beside the Ajaxes into war.
Agamemnon rejoiced, and addressed them: “Ajaxes, leaders of the Argives, you need no urging;
I do not command you. You yourselves drive your people to fight with all their strength.
Would that Zeus,

Athena, and Apollo gave such courage to every heart!
Then Priam's city soon would bow to our hands, taken and sacked."
He left them, and found Nestor, clear-voiced speaker of the Pylians, arranging and urging on his friends:
great Pelagon, Alastor, Chromius, Haimon, lord Bias, and shepherd of the people. He placed the horsemen first, with horses and chariots, and many excellent footmen behind them, a wall of war; the cowards he drove into the middle, so that even unwilling men should fight beneath compulsion. To the horsemen he first gave commands: "Keep your horses in check;
do not let them plunge among the crowd. Do not trust in horsemanship and courage to rush alone before the others, or to fall back; your line grows weaker.
When one man reaches another chariot from his own, let him reach forth with his spear. So older warriors destroyed cities and walls, holding this thought and courage in their breasts." Agamemnon rejoiced to see the old man: "Elder, would that your knees followed the spirit in your breast, and that your strength remained firm! But age wears you down.

Would another man possess your years, and you belong among the young!" Gerenian horseman Nestor replied:
"Atreus' son,
I too would wish to be as I was when I killed godlike Ereuthalion. Yet the gods do not give all things to men at once. If I were young again, or if strength were firm within my limbs, I would stand among the horsemen, and lead them.
Now urge on the younger men; I shall follow with my counsel, and they will obey, as is right." The son of Atreus went on, rejoicing in his heart. He found Peteus' son Menestheus standing, and round him the Athenians, masters of the battle-cry.
Nearby stood Odysseus, rich in counsel,
and round him the unshaken Cephalenians.
Their people had not yet heard the battle-call;
the newly gathered phalanxes waited, watching for another Trojan tower to advance and begin.
Agamemnon rebuked them:
"Son of Peteus, Zeus-nourished king, skilled in crooked counsel, why shrink back and wait for others? You should stand among the first,

meet the burning battle, and hear my feasts proclaimed before the elders, when we prepare them.
There you gladly eat roast meat and drink honey-sweet wine as long as you desire;
now you would gladly see ten Achaean towers fighting before you.” Many-counseled Odysseus looked darkly at him:
“Atreus’ son, what word escaped the fence of your teeth? How can you say that we slacken the war, when we stir sharp Ares against the horse-taming Trojans? You shall see, if you desire it, Telemachus’ dear father mingling among the foremost ranks.
Your words are wind.”
Agamemnon smiled, knowing the man was angry, and took back his speech: “God-born son of Laertes, rich in counsel, I do not rebuke or command you.
I know your heart devises gentle plans, the same plans I devise. Let those words be healed

hereafter, if any harm was spoken; may the gods make all of it wind.” He left them and found Tydeus’ high-hearted son Diomedes standing among his horses and close-fitted chariots,
with Sthenelus beside him, son of Capaneus.
Agamemnon rebuked him: “Son of Tydeus, why shrink back, why watch the bridges of battle?
It was not dear to Tydeus to shrink so, but to fight far before his friends, as those who saw him labor said. I never met him, but so they tell me.
He entered Mycenae as a guest with godlike Polynices, gathering a people, when they campaigned against the sacred walls of seven-gated Thebes.
They begged us for famous allies, and we agreed; but Zeus turned us back, showing signs against our will. When they had gone and reached deep-reeded Asopus, the Achaeans sent Tydeus as messenger. He went and found many Cadmeans feasting in the house of mighty Eteocles. Though a guest and alone among many Cadmeans, horseman Tydeus was not afraid; he challenged
them
to contests and won them all easily—for Athena helped him.
The angry Cadmeans set an ambush on his return, fifty young men led by two:

Maeon, like an immortal, and Polyphontes, son of Autophonus.
Tydeus gave them all a shameful death, sending Maeon home alone, because he trusted the gods' signs.
Such was Tydeus, the Aetolian; but he fathered a son worse than himself in war, though better in council."

Strong Diomedes said nothing, ashamed before the honored king.
But Sthenelus, glorious son of Capaneus, answered: "Son of Atreus, do not lie when you know the truth.
We boast that we are better than our fathers.

We took seven-gated Thebes with fewer men, bringing an army beneath its wall, trusting the gods' signs and Zeus's help; our fathers perished through their folly.

Do not place our fathers' honor on the same scale as ours."

Diomedes looked beneath his brows:
"Friend, sit silent and obey my word.
I do not resent Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, for urging the well-greaved

Achaeans to fight. Glory will follow him if the Achaeans sack the Trojans and take sacred Ilium; great grief will follow him if the Achaeans are destroyed.

Come, then, let us remember our fierce courage."

He leapt from his chariot in his armor; the bronze rang terribly on the king's chest, and fear would have seized even the steadfast.

When the two hosts came together,
the ranks advanced without pause. Each commander gave his orders; the rest moved silently—you would not think so many people possessed voices—for they feared their officers' commands, while the variegated armor flashed about them as they marched.
The Trojans raised a cry like sheep within the courtyard of a rich man, thousands waiting to be milked, and bleating without end when they hear the lambs' voices.
Thus confusion rose through the Trojan host: no single voice, no single language, but a mingling of tongues, men called from many lands. Ares stirred some, bright-eyed Athena others, and Deimos, Phobos, and unwearied Strife, the sister and companion of man-slaying Ares. Her head at first is small;
soon she plants it in heaven, while her feet walk upon earth. She cast mutual hatred among them, and increased the groan of men as through the ranks she moved.
When they reached one place, hide struck hide;

spears and the strength of bronze-clad men struck together, and bossed shields crashed on shields.
A mighty tumult rose: groans and shouts of triumph from men who killed and men who died, and blood ran over the ground. As when two winter torrents, rushing down the mountains, pour their waters together in a hollow ravine from great springs, and a shepherd hears their thunder far away
among the hills, so from the armies' meeting
came clamor and pain.
Antilochus was first to kill a Trojan champion, Echepolus, son of Thalysius. First he struck the horsehair crest of Echepolus' helmet;
the bronze point fixed in his forehead, passed through bone, and darkness covered his eyes.
He fell, a tower struck down in furious battle.
Elephenor, son of Chalcodon, great-hearted leader of the Abantes, seized him by the feet and dragged him from the missiles, eager to strip his armor. But his labor was brief.
Agenor saw him,

and as he bent beside the shield, drove his spear
into the ribs exposed beneath it and loosed his limbs.
Thus Elephenor's spirit went.
Trojans and Achaeans fought terribly above the body, rushing together like wolves, while man struck man.
Telamonian Ajax struck Simoeisius, flourishing son of Anthemion, whom his mother bore beside the banks of Simoeis, coming down from Ida
with her parents to see the flocks.
Therefore
they named him Simoeisius. He never repaid his dear parents for their upbringing;
his life was short, and Ajax's great-hearted spear brought him down.
Ajax struck his chest beside the right nipple;
the bronze passed out through the shoulder,
and he fell in dust like a smooth poplar grown in a broad, wet meadow, branches high at the crown, cut by a chariot-builder with shining iron to bend it into a beautiful chariot-rim, then left beside the river.
Antiphus, Priam's son, cast his sharp spear at Ajax, missed, and struck Leucus instead,

Odysseus' excellent companion, as he dragged a corpse aside. The dead man fell from his hands;
Leucus fell over him. Odysseus grew fiercely angry at his companion's death. Helmeted in bright bronze, he passed among the champions,
stood near,
and cast his shining spear. The Trojans shrank, but not in vain did he cast: he struck Democoon, Priam's bastard son, who came from Abydos
beside the swift horses. At the temple Odysseus struck; the bronze went through, and darkness covered his eyes.
His armor clattered as he fell.
The champions and radiant Hector withdrew;
the Argives raised a mighty shout, drew off the dead, and advanced much farther. Apollo, looking down from Pergamos, grew angry and called:
"Rise, horse-taming Trojans; yield not to the Achaeans.
Their flesh is neither stone nor iron, proof against the bronze that cuts the flesh.
Nor does Achilles, fair-haired Thetis' son, fight; he nurses still his heart-paining anger beside the
ships."

The terrible god spoke from the city, while Athena, glorious daughter of Zeus, stirred the Achaeans
wherever she saw them slacken.
There Fate caught Diores, son of Amarynceus: a jagged stone struck beside his ankle, crushing tendons and bones of his right leg.
Peirous, son of Imbrasus, leader of the Thracians who came from Aenus, had thrown it. Diores fell backward in the dust, stretching both hands
to his companions, and breathing out his spirit.
Peirous, who had struck him, rushed forward;
Thoas the Aetolian stabbed him above the nipple, and the bronze lodged deep within his lung.
Thoas came close, pulled the great spear from his chest, drew his sharp sword, and struck his belly, taking away his life. He could not strip the armor:
the Thracians with their long spears stood around, and though he was great, strong, and splendid, they drove Thoas back. Thus the two leaders lay stretched beside each other in the dust—one leader of Thracians, one of bronze-clad Epeans—and many others were killed around them.

Then no man could blame a man for moving through the middle of battle, still unstruck, unwounded by sharp bronze, if Pallas Athena took him by the hand and turned the missiles aside. For on that day many Trojans and Achaeans lay face-down together in the dust.

Source range: Book 4. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — The oath breaks beneath Athena's descending arrow

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 5

First-pass working translation

Then Pallas Athena gave courage and strength to Tydeus' son Diomedes, that he might shine among the Argives and win enduring fame.

From helmet and shield she kindled an unwearied fire, like the autumn star that shines most brightly after bathing in Ocean. Such a fire she lit from head to shoulders, and drove him into the midst, where the greatest number pressed together.

Among the Trojans lived a rich and blameless man, Dares, priest of Hephaestus. Two sons he had,

Phegeus and Idaios, skilled in every art of war.

They drove straight against Diomedes—one from the car, the other on foot. When they came near, Phegeus cast first his long-shadowed spear; its point passed over the left shoulder of Diomedes and missed.

The son of Tydeus cast next, nor flew his spear in vain: it struck Phegeus in the chest between the nipples, and thrust him from his horses.

Idaios sprang away, leaving the lovely chariot;

he could not stand above his brother.
Nor would he have escaped black Fate, but Hephaestus saved him, covering him in night, that the old priest might not be left altogether childless. Tydeus' son drove the horses to his friends, to lead them to the ships.

When the great-hearted Trojans saw one son fleeing, the other slain beside the chariot, their hearts were shaken. Bright-eyed Athena took Ares by the hand:

"Ares, Ares, destroyer of mortals, wall-breaker, let us leave Trojans and Achaeans to fight, and withdraw, avoiding Zeus's anger. Whichever side he grants the glory, let that side possess it."

So she led fierce Ares from the battle and seated him beside the sandy Scamander. The Danaans drove the Trojans back, and every captain killed a man.

First Agamemnon struck great Odius down, leader of the Halizonians; as he turned, the spear drove between his shoulders, passed through his chest, and made his armor ring.

Idomeneus killed Phaestus, son of Borus' son Maeon, who had come from deep-soiled Tarne. As Phaestus mounted his horses, Idomeneus struck his right shoulder; hateful darkness took him, and his attendants stripped his armor.
Menelaus killed Scamandrius, Strophius' son, a skilled hunter whom Artemis herself had taught to strike each wild creature the forest breeds.
But Artemis, mistress of the bow, did not help him then.
As Scamandrius fled, Menelaus struck his back;
the spear passed between his shoulders through the chest.
Meriones killed Phereclus, son of Tecton's son Harmonides, who knew to make all intricate things with his hands, and was beloved by Athena. For Alexander he built the equal ships that brought evil on Troy and Paris, since he knew not the gods' decrees.
Meriones pursued and struck his right buttock;
the point passed beneath the bone and came out at the bladder. He fell upon his knees, crying aloud, and death covered him.
Meges killed Pedaeus, Antenor's bastard son,

whom noble Theano raised as tenderly as her own, for her husband's sake. Phyleus' famous son drew near and struck him at the nape; the sharp spear passed under his tongue, between his teeth, and cold bronze took away his spirit.
Eurypylus, son of Euaemon, killed Hypsenor,
the godlike son of Dolopion, priest of Scamander,
honored among the people like a god. As Hypsenor fled, Eurypylus overtook him and cut his heavy arm away at the shoulder; the bloodied hand fell on the plain, and purple death seized him.
So they labored through the strong battle. You could not have known whether Diomedes stood among Trojans or Achaeans; he swept across the plain like a winter torrent that quickly breaks the bridges.
Neither bridges nor fences of flowering orchards restrain it when Zeus' rain descends in force, and many fine works of young men fall before it.
So beneath Diomedes' hands the Trojan ranks were scattered; even their multitude could not stand.
When Lycaon's glorious son saw him rushing, driving the ranks before him, he bent his curved bow and struck Diomedes in the right shoulder,

where the corselet swelled. The bitter arrow passed through; blood stained his armor. Pandarus cried aloud: “Rise, great-hearted Trojans, drivers of horses!
The best of the Achaeans is wounded; surely he will not long endure the bitter arrow, if the son of Zeus truly sent me here from Lycia.” But the swift arrow did not subdue Diomedes.
He withdrew before his horses and his chariot, and called to Sthenelus, Capaneus’
son:
“Rise, dear friend; leap down from the chariot, and draw the bitter arrow from my shoulder.”
Sthenelus sprang down and pulled it straight through;
blood spurted through the twisted tunic. Then Diomedes prayed: “Hear me, daughter of aegis-bearing Zeus, unwearied one.
If ever you stood kindly beside my father in fierce war, be kind to me now, Athena. Grant me to kill the man who struck me, who shot first, and boasts that I shall not long behold the sun’s bright light.” He prayed, and Pallas Athena heard.
She made his limbs light, and quickened hand and foot; then, standing near,

she spoke winged words: “Take heart now, Diomedes, and fight the Trojans. I have set within your breast your father’s courage, the fearless force Tydeus carried behind his shield. I have taken from your eyes the mist that lay there before, so that you may recognize god and man. If any god comes here to test you, do not fight the other immortals face to face.
But if Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, enters battle, wound her with sharp bronze.” So bright-eyed Athena withdrew.
Diomedes returned to the front ranks, already eager for
the Trojans;
now his courage was threefold. As when a shepherd wounds a lion leaping over the sheepfold, yet cannot tame it, and the wounded beast’s strength rises while the shepherd will not defend himself—the sheep huddle together, and the lion leaps from the deep fold—so the mighty son of Tydeus entered the midst of
the Trojans.
He killed Astynous, shepherd of the people,
with bronze above the nipple; Hypeiron he struck with his great sword at the collarbone, severing shoulder, neck, and back. Leaving them, he pursued Abas and Polyidus, sons of old Eurydamas, a dream-reader who did not read their returning dream. Strong Diomedes stripped them of their arms. Then he went against Xanthus and Thoon, both beloved sons of Phaenops, whom grievous old age wore down. He had no other son to leave his possessions. Diomedes killed them both, leaving their father grief and bitter mourning; he would not receive his sons alive, and their kinsmen divided the inheritance. Then he seized two sons of Priam, Echemmon and Chromius, in one chariot. As a lion springs among cattle and breaks the neck of calf or heifer, so Tydeus' son hurled both unwilling from their horses, stripped their armor, and gave the horses to his friends to drive toward the hollow ships. When Aeneas saw Diomedes scattering the ranks, he crossed the battle seeking Pandarus. He found Lycaon's son within the dense shield-wall of men who followed him from Aesepus. Aeneas asked where his bow was, and urged him to shoot the man who had done such harm to Troy. Pandarus answered that he knew Diomedes by his shield, his helmet, and his horses, but suspected a god stood near him. The arrow he had already shot through Diomedes' shoulder had not subdued him. His horses and chariot were absent; at home eleven new chariots stood in Lycaon's house, but he had come on foot, trusting in a bow that had drawn blood from Tydeus' son and Atreus' son. If he returned to his native land, his wife, and his high-roofed house, he would break the bow in bright fire; it had followed him uselessly. Aeneas told him that nothing would change until they went together against Diomedes. He offered his chariot, praising its Trojan horses, who knew to chase and flee. Pandarus answered: "Keep the reins; the horses know your voice. I shall meet the attack with my spear." They mounted the variegated chariot and drove against Diomedes. Sthenelus saw them and warned Diomedes:

“Two powerful men are coming against you—Pandarus, the famous bowman, and Aeneas, son of Anchises, whose mother is Aphrodite.
Let us withdraw upon the horses, lest you lose your life.” Diomedes answered that he would not flee or crouch; his strength remained, and Pallas Athena forbade his fear.
He ordered Sthenelus to hold their
horses,
and, if Athena granted him both deaths, to seize Aeneas’ horses and drive them from
the Trojans.
They descended from the chariot and rushed together.
Pandarus cast his long-shadowed spear at Diomedes’ shield; the bronze passed through and touched the corselet.
He shouted that Diomedes was wounded through the flank and would not long endure.
Diomedes answered: “You have missed. Neither of us shall cease before one man falls and satisfies fierce Ares.”
Athena guided his spear beside Pandarus’ eye;
it broke his white teeth, cut the root of his tongue, and passed beneath his chin. He fell from the chariot, his bright armor clattering, while his swift horses ran loose.

Aeneas leapt down with shield and long spear, circling the body like a lion, eager to kill whoever approached. Diomedes lifted a stone—a great feat for two men of the present age—but swung and hurled it alone. It struck Aeneas at the hip, crushed the socket, and tore both tendons.
Aeneas fell to his knees and propped himself
with his broad hand; black night covered his eyes.
Aphrodite, his mother, saw him and cast her white arms around her son, spreading a fold of her shining robe before him as a shield against the arrows.
She carried him away from war.
Sthenelus remembered Diomedes’ command, held back their horses, seized Aeneas’ fine-maned team, and drove them toward the ships.
He gave them to Deipylus, his trusted companion; then mounted his own horses and pursued Diomedes.
Diomedes charged Aphrodite, knowing she was a powerless goddess—not Athena, nor Enyo, who rule the wars of men.
When he reached her, he wounded the soft top of her hand with his sharp spear. Bronze pierced the ambrosial robe the Graces had made; immortal ichor flowed, for the gods eat no grain and drink no dark wine.

Aphrodite cried out and dropped her son. Phoebus Apollo caught him in his arms, covering him with a dark cloud, lest any swift-footed Danaan drive bronze into his chest and take away his life.
Diomedes shouted after Aphrodite: “Yield, daughter of Zeus, who rules the battle and the strife!
Is it not enough that you deceive defenseless women?
If you come again to war, I think you will shudder at the very name of battle, even when you hear it elsewhere.” Iris, the wind-footed, took her from the throng, her beautiful skin darkening beneath the pain.
She found swift Ares on the battle’s left, sitting;
his spear lay in the mist, and his swift horses stood nearby.
Falling upon her knees, she pleaded with her brother:
“Dear brother, care for me; give me your horses, that I may reach Olympus, the seat of the immortals.
I suffer greatly from the wound a mortal man has given me, Tydeus’ son, who would fight even father Zeus.”
Ares gave her his golden-maned horses. Aphrodite climbed into the chariot, her heart in grief;

Iris sat beside her, took the reins, and lashed the team.
Swiftly they reached Olympus, the steep seat of the gods.
Iris halted the horses, unharnessed them, and laid ambrosial food before them.
Aphrodite fell upon her knees before her mother Dione. Dione embraced and stroked her, asking which Uranian god had done this rash deed, as though her child had been caught in some evil act.
Aphrodite answered: “The high-hearted son of Tydeus, Diomedes, wounded me, because I carried my dear son Aeneas from the battle; he is dearest to me.
This is no longer war only between Trojans and Achaeans—the Danaans now fight the immortals.”
Dione told her to endure: many who dwell in Olympus have suffered hard pain at mortal hands. Ares endured when the Aloadae, Otus and Ephialtes, bound him in bronze bonds for thirteen months, until Hermes secretly rescued him. Hera endured when Amphitryon’s strong son shot her in the right breast. Hades endured the swift arrow Heracles shot at him in Pylos, and went in pain to Zeus's house, the arrow lodged within his shoulder. Paeon poured pain-soothing medicines upon Hades, for he was not mortal.

Dione rebuked the violent archer who had harmed the gods.
Athena had set Diomedes against Aphrodite; foolishly he did not know that a man who fights the immortals does not return long from war. Let him beware, lest his wife, wise Aegialeia, Adrastus' daughter, should wake from sleep and lament for her husband, the best of the Achaeans, Diomedes, tamer of horses. She wiped the ichor from Aphrodite's hand; the hand was healed, and the heavy pains grew still.
Hera and Athena watched, and teased Zeus with sharp words.
Athena began: "Father Zeus, will you be angry if I speak?
Cypris has surely urged one Achaean woman to follow the Trojans she loves; and, while caressing one of our well-robed Achaean women, she scratched her delicate hand upon a golden brooch." The father of gods and men smiled, and called golden Aphrodite near:
"My child, warlike deeds are not given to you; pursue instead the lovely works of marriage. Let swift Ares and Athena attend to these."

While they spoke, Diomedes rushed again at Aeneas, knowing Apollo himself held his hands above the hero.
Yet he did not fear the great god; still he desired to kill Aeneas and strip his famous armor. Three times he charged to kill him; three times Apollo struck his shining shield aside. At the fourth, like a god, Apollo shouted: "Beware, son of Tydeus, and draw back.
Do not think as the gods do; no equal race is run between immortals and men who walk the earth." Diomedes withdrew a little, avoiding the far-shooter's anger.
Apollo set Aeneas apart in sacred Pergamus, where his temple stood; Leto and Artemis healed and honored him in the great sanctuary.
Apollo made an image like Aeneas, in form and armor, and around that image Trojans and Achaeans beat one another, striking their rounded ox-hide shields. Then Phoebus called Ares: "Ares, destroyer of mortals, wall-breaker, will you not go into battle and draw this man, Diomedes, out?
He would fight even father Zeus now. First he wounded Cypris near the wrist; then against me he rushed like a god." So Apollo sat upon the height of Pergamus, while Ares entered the crowd in the likeness of Acamas,

leader of the Thracians, urging on
the Trojans.

The Trojans' ranks were urged on by fierce Ares,
who had taken the form of swift Acamas,
leader of the Thracians. He called to Priam's sons:

"Sons of Priam, Zeus-nourished king, how long will you let the Achaeans kill your people?

Will you wait until they fight around your well-built gates?

Aeneas lies there, a good companion whom we honored like Hector. Come, let us save him from the tumult."

His words stirred every heart.

Then divine Sarpedon rebuked
Hector:

"Hector, where has the courage gone that once you had?

You said you could hold the city without its people or allies, alone with brothers and sons-in-law.

Now I see none of them; they shrink like dogs

around a lion, while we fight as allies you summoned.

I came from far-off Lycia beside the whirling Xanthus,

leaving a dear wife, a little son, and many possessions;

yet I urge my Lycians, and myself, to meet a man.

Here I have nothing for an Achaean to carry away, but you stand idle, and do not command your people to remain and guard the walls. Take care lest you and yours become prey, caught like flax in a snare, while the enemy soon sacks your city. Entreat the famous allies,

night and day, to stand without ceasing,

and lay aside your harsh reproach."

His speech pierced Hector's heart.

Hector leapt from his chariot in armor, shook his sharp spears, and moved throughout the host, rousing dreadful battle.

They turned and faced the Achaeans; the Argives stood together and did not flee. As a wind carries chaff

across a sacred threshing floor when men winnow grain, and the straw heaps grow white beneath it, so the Achaeans grew white in dust, as hooves drove dust upward to the bronze sky and drivers wheeled their teams.

But fierce Ares covered the Trojans with darkness,

moving everywhere to aid them and fulfilling Apollo's command, who sent him to raise Trojan courage when he saw

Athena withdraw, leaving aid to the Danaans.

Apollo himself brought Aeneas from the sanctuary and put strength into him. His companions rejoiced when they saw him alive, unhurt, and full of courage, but did not ask what had happened: another labor was being raised by Apollo, Ares, and unwearied Strife.
The two Ajaxes, Odysseus, and Diomedes urged the Danaans to fight. They did not fear Trojan strength or arrows, but stood like clouds that Cronus' son holds still upon the mountain peaks until Boreas' force, and that of the other fierce winds, sleeps.
So the Danaans stood fast and did not flee.
Agamemnon moved among them, calling:
"Be men, friends; take a valiant heart, and honor one another in the fierce
battle.
More men survive when shame is felt;
among the fleeing there is neither glory nor courage."
He cast his spear and struck Deicoon, companion of Aeneas, son of Pergasus, honored like Priam's sons because he fought among the first.
The spear passed through shield and belt into his lower belly;
he fell, and his armor rang upon him.

Aeneas killed two excellent
Achaeans, Crethon and Orsilochus, sons of Diocles,
a wealthy man in well-built Pherae, whose line descended from Alpheius, the broad-flowing river of Pylian land.
Diocles fathered twins skilled in war.
When they grew,
they followed the Argives to Ilium, to win honor for Agamemnon and Menelaus; but death's end covered them.
As two lions raised by their mother in thick forest raven cattle and sheep in the folds of
men, until sharp bronze killed them in men's hands, so Aeneas subdued them, and they fell like tall firs.
The war-loving Menelaus pitied the fallen pair.
Helmeted in flashing bronze, he passed through the foremost ranks, brandishing his spear. Ares, meaning him to fall beneath Aeneas'
hands, stirred his courage. Antilochus, Nestor's great-hearted son, saw him and hurried through the battle, fearing for the shepherd of the people, lest the day's labor be lost.
The two stood face to face, eager for the fight;
Antilochus kept close beside Menelaus.

Aeneas, though swift in war, would not wait when he saw the two champions joined. They dragged the dead back among the Achaeans, laid the fallen in their companions' hands, and turned again into the foremost line. There they slew Pylæmenes, leader of the great-shielded Paphlagonians: Menelaus struck him beneath the collarbone.
Antilochus felled Mydon, his charioteer,
striking the elbow that held the reins. The ivory-white reins dropped in dust; Antilochus sprang upon him with the sword and drove him from the well-built car, face and shoulders buried in sand, until the horses were seized and led away among the Achaean ranks.
Hector saw them and came shouting against them, with Trojan battalions behind. Ares led the way, and Enyo bore the shameless tumult of war.
Ares swung his enormous spear, now before Hector, now behind him. Diomedes, seeing the god, shuddered like a helpless traveler who, standing above a river pouring foaming into the sea, sees the flood and runs back.

He called to his friends: "Look how we marvel at Hector, noble spearman and daring warrior!
Some god always stands beside him, warding off destruction—and now that god is Ares, made like a mortal man. Face the Trojans, but give ground ever backward.
Desire not to fight the gods by force."
The Trojans came close. Hector killed Menesthes and Anchialus, two companions in one chariot.
Great Telamonian Ajax pitied them,
stood near,
and cast his bright spear at Amphius, son of Selagus,
a wealthy man who dwelt in Paesus among grain fields, but whom fate led to fight beside Priam and his sons.
Ajax struck him beneath the belt; the long-shadowed spear fixed in his belly, and he fell with a crash.
Ajax ran to strip his armor, but Trojan spears poured around him, and his shield received them all.
He tore the bronze from the dead, yet could not take the beautiful armor; the press of the many and the brave drove him back, and he staggered beneath their charge.
Then Fate, strong and pitiless, set against godlike

Sarpedon the tall and excellent Tlepolemus, son of Heracles. When they drew near—son and grandson of Zeus who gathers the clouds—Tlepolemus first addressed the Lycian captain: “Sarpedon, counselor of the Lycians, what compels you to crouch before the battle, a man unpracticed in war? They lie who call you son of aegis-bearing Zeus; you fall far short of those men said to have sprung from him in earlier days. My father Heracles was brave and lion-hearted. He came here once for Laomedon’s horses, with six ships and few men, and laid Ilium waste, leaving its streets bereaved. But your spirit is poor, and your people waste away. No defense shall you be to Troy, though you came from Lycia; beneath my spear you shall be subdued, and pass through Hades’ gates.” Sarpedon answered: “Tlepolemus, that man destroyed sacred Ilium through proud Laomedon’s blindness, who repaid good service with an evil word and would not give the horses for which Heracles came from far away.
But here, I tell you, you shall find death and black Fate.

Slain beneath my spear, you shall give glory to me, and your spirit to Hades, lord of the famous horses.”
They raised their spears. Both shafts flew wide; then Sarpedon struck Tlepolemus’ neck, and the grievous point passed through.
Black night covered his eyes.
Tlepolemus struck Sarpedon’s left thigh;
the spear drove through and lodged against the bone, yet Zeus’ son was not wholly overcome. His dear companions carried him from battle, the long spear dragging after him, for no one thought to draw the ash from his thigh as they hurried beneath that burden.
The well-greaved Achaeans bore Tlepolemus away.
Odysseus saw him, and his brave heart burned. He wondered whether to pursue Zeus’ son or take the lives of many Lycians, but it was not his portion to kill the mighty son of Zeus.
Athena turned his spirit toward the Lycian multitude, and he slew Coeranus, Alastor, Chromius, Alcander, Halios, Noemon, and Prytanis.
He would have killed more, but Hector, great-helmed son of Priam, saw the danger and crossed the foremost ranks, bringing dread to the Danaans.
Sarpedon, son of Zeus, rejoiced at his coming and spoke in grief: “Priam’s son, do not leave me as prey for the Danaans.

Defend me, and then let life abandon me here in your city.
I was not destined to return home and gladden my dear wife and little son.” Hector gave no answer, but rushed past, eager to thrust back
the Argives and take the lives of many. His companions set Sarpedon beneath Zeus’ beautiful oak. There strong Pelagon, his beloved friend, drew the ash from his thigh.
His spirit left him, and mist covered
his eyes;
then the breath of the North Wind blew upon him, and he revived, gasping and faint.
But once Ares and bronze-clad Hector entered the battle, the Argives neither advanced toward the black ships nor stood to meet them; they gave ground continually when they heard that Ares was among the Trojans.
Whom did Hector and bronze Ares first and last strip of life?
Teuthras; horse-driving Orestes; the spearman Trechus; Oenomaus; Helenus, son of Oenops; and Oresbius with the bright belt, who dwelt beside the Cephissian lake in Hyle, rich in goods, while other Boeotians lived near him upon their fertile land.

White-armed Hera saw the Argives falling in hard battle and spoke to Athena: “Shame! Shall our promise to Menelaus be vain—that well-walled Ilium should fall—if we let destructive Ares rage so? Let us put forth our strength.” Athena did not refuse. Hera harnessed her swift golden-maned horses. Hebe fitted the curved eight-spoked wheels upon the iron axle: their rims were gold, their tires bronze, a wonder to behold, their rounded spokes of silver.
The chariot was stretched with golden and silver straps, and two rails ran around it. From its front the silver pole extended; at its tip Hera fastened the beautiful golden yoke and laid on the reins.
Athena cast her embroidered robe at her father’s feet, put on Zeus’ warlike tunic, and armed herself with the tasselled aegis, crowned with Fear, Strife, Strength, and the dreadful Gorgon head. Upon her head she set the four-crested golden helmet, fitted for a hundred cities; she mounted the flaming car and took the great spear with which she breaks the ranks of heroes who have angered her strong father.

Hera urged the horses on. Of their own accord the gates of heaven groaned—the gates held by the Hours, who open and close the dense cloud between Olympus and the sky. They passed through and found Zeus sitting apart from all the gods upon the highest peak of Olympus. White-armed Hera stopped her horses there and spoke: “Father Zeus, are you not angered when you behold the deeds of Ares—how many Argives he has destroyed, heedless of order? Yet Cypris and far-shooting Apollo delight in loosing that mad one, who knows no law. Father Zeus, will you be angry if I drive him from battle, struck grievously?” “Bring Athena, the spoiler of hosts,” Zeus answered; “she is the one most often accustomed to draw near him with bitter pains.” Hera did not refuse. She lashed the horses; they flew between the earth and the starry heaven. As far as a man can see the haze while seated on a lookout over the wine-dark sea, so far the high-driving horses of the gods leapt at once. When they reached Troy, where the two rivers meet, Simoeis and Scamander, Hera stopped them, unhitched them, and cast a deep mist around them. Simoeis raised ambrosia for the horses to eat. Hera and Athena went on like shy doves toward the place where the best of the Argives stood around horse-taming Diomedes, gathered like lions or boars whose strength is not easily broken. Hera cried in the voice of Stentor, whose bronze voice equaled the voices of fifty men: “Shame, Argives—cowards in beautiful bodies! While noble Achilles walked among you, the Trojans never dared leave the Dardanian gates, so greatly they feared his terrible spear. Now they fight far from the city, beside the hollow ships.” Her cry awakened courage in them all. Athena found Diomedes beside his horses and chariot, wiping the wound that Pandarus’ arrow had made. Sweat tormented him beneath the broad shield-strap; his arm grew weary as he wiped the dark blood away. The goddess touched the yoke and spoke: “Little did Tydeus beget a son like himself! Tydeus was small in body, but a fighter. When I forbade him to fight, or burst into the tumult, and he came as messenger to Thebes among the Cadmeans, I told him to feast quietly within the halls.

Yet his strong spirit challenged the young men and defeated them all, for I stood beside him.
I stand beside and guard you also.
Fight freely.
Has long weariness weakened your limbs, or does fear hold you? You are no son of Tydeus, the battle-wise Oeneid.” Diomedes answered: “I know you, goddess,
daughter of aegis-bearing Zeus, and will hide nothing.
Neither fear nor cowardice holds me; I remember still the commands you gave me—not to fight the blessed gods openly. Yet if Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, comes into battle, I may wound her with sharp bronze.
Therefore I withdraw and bid the other Argives gather;
I know that Ares rules the fight.” Athena replied: “Diomedes, dear to my heart, fear neither Ares nor any other immortal;
I am your defense. Drive your sure-hoofed horses straight at Ares. Strike him close; do not dread that mad, shifting god, who lately boasted to Hera and me that he would fight for Troy and aid

the Argives,
but now mingles with the Trojans and forgets his promise.” She thrust Sthenelus from the chariot and drew him back with her hand; he sprang away. Then the goddess mounted beside Diomedes. The beech axle groaned beneath the weight of a god and a great man.
Pallas Athena
took the reins and drove first against Ares.
Ares was stripping the armor from huge Periphas, best of the Aetolians, when Athena put on the helmet of Hades, that the mighty god might not see her.
As soon as Ares, the bane of mortals, saw Diomedes,
he left Periphas where he had first slain him and came straight against the horse-tamer.
Ares thrust over yoke and reins, eager to take the mortal’s life; Athena caught the
spear
and drove it aside, so that it flew in vain.
Diomedes thrust with his bronze
spear;
Athena guided it beneath the belly, where the belt was fastened. He struck Ares, tore the beautiful flesh, and drew the spear away. The brazen god cried

as loudly as nine or ten thousand men cry when war's quarrel brings them
together;
a shudder seized Achaeans and Trojans alike.
As dark air appears from clouds when the hot wind rises from a stormy quarter, so bronze Ares appeared to Diomedes, rising among the clouds toward broad heaven.
Swiftly he reached Olympus, sat beside Zeus, and showed the immortal blood that ran from his wound.
"Father Zeus," he lamented, "do you not see these deeds?
We gods suffer always through one another's will, bringing favor to mortal men. We all fight
because you begot this senseless, ruinous daughter, whose mind is ever set on lawless deeds.
The other gods in Olympus obey you and bow beneath your will, but you restrain her neither in word nor deed, because you yourself fathered this destructive child.
She has driven arrogant Diomedes against the immortals:
first he wounded Cypris at the wrist, then rushed upon me as though he were a god.
My swift feet saved me; else I should have suffered long among the dreadful dead, or lived powerless beneath bronze." Zeus looked at him darkly: "Do not sit beside me and whimper, you who turn against your own side.

You are the god I hate most among the Olympians.
Strife, war, and battle are always
dear to you.
You have your mother's unyielding temper—Hera's;
even I can scarcely master her with
words.
I think her counsels have brought you this pain.
Yet I will not endure your suffering
long,
for you are my child, and your mother bore you to me.
Had you been born from another god, destructive one, you would long ago have been lower than the sons of Heaven."
He commanded Paeon to heal him.
Paeon spread pain-soothing medicines upon the wound, and it closed at once, for Ares was not fashioned mortal.
As curdling fig-juice quickly thickens white milk when stirred, so quickly the medicine healed the furious god.
Hebe washed him and dressed him in shining garments; he sat beside Zeus in glory. Hera of Argos
and Athena of Alalcomenae returned to the great house of Zeus, having stopped murderous Ares in his slaughter.

Source range: Book 5. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Diomedes advances while wounded Aphrodite withdraws

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 6

First-pass working translation

The battle rolled on, terrible, between the Trojans and the Achaeans;
their bronze-shod spears drove straight against one another between the streams of Simoeis and Xanthus.
Great Telamonian Ajax, the rampart of the Achaeans, broke the Trojan line first and brought light to his friends.

He struck Acamas, son of Eussorus, the best and tallest of the Thracians; the bronze point pierced the horse-haired crest, entered his forehead,

and darkness covered his eyes.

Diomedes slew Axylus, son of Teuthras,

a rich man who dwelt in well-built Arisbe and loved all men: his house stood beside the road, and every traveler found welcome there. Yet no one could stand before Diomedes and save him from the fatal day; he took both

Axylus and his charioteer Calesius, and the two went down together in dust.

Euryalus stripped Dresus and Opheltius, then went on against Aesepeus and

Pedasus, twin sons whom the water-nymph Abarbarea bore to noble Bucolion.

Bucolion was the eldest son of proud Laomedon, but his mother bore him in secret. While he tended sheep he lay with the nymph, who conceived and brought forth the twins; now the son of Mecisteus broke their strength and took the shining armor from their shoulders. War-loving Polypoetes

slew Astyalus; Odysseus struck down Percosius with bronze, and Teucer felled Aretaon. Antilochus, Nestor's son, killed Ablerus with his bright
spear;

Agamemnon, lord of men, killed Elatus, who dwelt beside the fair-flowing

Satnioeis near steep Pedasus. Leitus took Phylacus as he fled, and Eurypylus

stripped Melanthius of life.

Menelaus seized Adrastus alive. His frightened horses, startled across the plain, broke the curved chariot's pole against a tamarisk branch; they ran toward the city where the others fled, while Adrastus rolled headlong from the car and fell face-first in the dust.

Menelaus stood above him with his long-shadowed spear. Adrastus clasped the Atrid's knees and pleaded:

"Take me alive, son of Atreus, and accept a ransom worthy of me. My wealthy father has bronze, gold, and much-worked iron stored in his house; he would give you measureless gifts if he heard that I was alive among the Achaean

ships.”

His words moved Menelaus' heart, and he was already about to send Adrastus

to the swift ships, into the hands of a servant, when Agamemnon came running and called aloud: “My good Menelaus, why do you care so for these men? Have the Trojans treated your house so well? Let none escape the steep death from our hands—not even the unborn child carried in its mother's womb.

Let all of Ilium perish, unburied and unseen.” His brother's words turned Menelaus' mind;

he thrust Adrastus away, and Agamemnon struck him beneath the ribs. As he fell, the Atريد planted his foot upon his chest and tore the ash spear free.

Then Nestor cried to the Argives: “Friends, Danaan heroes, servants of Ares,

let no one linger now beside the spoils, loading his hands with armor to carry back to the ships. Let us kill the men; afterward, when you stand untroubled,

you may strip the dead across the field.” His shout awakened every
heart.

The Trojans would have fled into Ilium beneath the Achaeans, had not Helenus,

Priam's son, best of all augurs, come to Aeneas and Hector and said:

“Aeneas

and Hector, on you above all Trojans and Lycians the labor rests, because you are best in counsel and battle. Stand here, and hold the people before the gates,

moving everywhere through the ranks, before they fall in flight into women's hands and become a joy to the enemy. When you have roused every battalion,

we will remain and fight the Danaans here, though we are sorely worn, for need drives us. Hector, go through the city; tell your mother and mine to gather the elders, open the temple of gray-eyed Athena on the city's height, and lay upon the goddess' knees the robe she believes most beautiful and most large, the one she loves best in the house. Promise twelve yearling heifers, never yet broken to the goad, if she will pity the city, the wives of Troy, and their little children,

and keep the fierce spear of Tydeus' son, the strong deviser of flight, from sacred

Ilium. I call him the strongest of all the Achaeans; not even Achilles, they say,

though born of a goddess, was ever so feared. This man rages beyond measure,

and no one can equal his strength.”

Hector did not disobey his brother.
He leapt from his chariot in his
armor, shook his sharp spears, and went everywhere through the army, urging the battle and waking the dreadful tumult. The Trojans turned and stood against the Achaeans;
the Argives gave ground and stopped their slaughter, believing that some immortal
had descended from the starry heaven to defend the Trojans. Hector called aloud: “Trojans, men of high spirit, and far-famed allies, be men, my friends, and remember your furious courage while I go into Ilium and tell the elders and our wives to pray to the gods and promise hecatombs.” Thus he spoke and went away, and the shield's rim, running lowest around its boss, struck his ankles and the dark skin of his neck.
Glaucus, son of Hippolochus, and Tydeus' son Diomedes came together between the armies, both eager to fight. When they had drawn near, Diomedes spoke first, his voice strong in battle: “Who are you, best of mortal men? I have never seen you before in the glory-making war; yet now you have gone far beyond all others in daring, to wait for my long-shadowed spear. The sons of the unhappy who meet my strength do not live long. If you have come down from heaven,

I will not fight the gods who dwell above; even mighty Lycurgus, son of Dryas, did not live long when he quarreled with the immortals. He once drove the nurses of raging Dionysus down the holy slopes of Nysa; they scattered the fennel wands while man-slaying Lycurgus beat them with his ox-goad. Dionysus, afraid, plunged beneath the sea, and Thetis received him trembling in her lap; the man's shout had filled him with terror. The gods who live easily were angered at Lycurgus, and the son of Cronus blinded him; nor did he live long, hated by every god.
I would not fight the blessed ones.
But if you are one of those mortals who eat the fruit of the earth, come nearer, that you may sooner reach the boundary of death.”
The shining son of Hippolochus answered: “Great-hearted son of Tydeus, why ask my lineage? Like the leaves, so is the race of men. The wind scatters one year's leaves upon the ground, and the forest, breaking into flower, grows others when spring returns. So one generation of men comes forth, and another passes

away.

Yet, if you wish to know this too, that you may know it well, many men know my house.

“There is a city called Ephyre, in the heart of horse-breeding Argos. There lived

Sisyphus, most cunning of men, Sisyphus son of Aeolus; his son was Glaucus, and

Glaucus fathered blameless Bellerophon. The gods gave Bellerophon beauty and lovely courage. But Proetus devised evil against him, and drove him from the people of Argos, for he was much stronger than they; Zeus had placed them beneath Proetus’ scepter. Then the wife of Proetus, divine Anteia, was seized with desire to lie secretly with him, but Bellerophon would not yield, for his thoughts were good.

She lied to King Proetus: ‘Die, Proetus, or kill Bellerophon, who sought to lie with me against my will.’ The king was angered, yet feared to kill him, and sent him to Lycia with a folded tablet bearing many signs of death, commanding that he be destroyed by the man who received it.

“Bellerophon went under the gods’ good escort. When he reached broad Lycia and the flowing Xanthus, the king welcomed and honored him, feasting him nine days and sacrificing nine oxen. On the tenth dawn he asked to see the deadly tablet

that Proetus had sent to the king.
When he had received it, he first commanded

Bellerophon to kill the unconquerable Chimera, a creature of divine stock:

in front a lion, behind a serpent, and in the middle a goat, breathing the terrible

strength of burning fire. Bellerophon killed her, trusting the omens of the gods.

Then he fought the glorious Solymi, saying that this was the hardest battle among men; and third he slew the man-like Amazons. When he returned, the king wove another close snare, choosing the best men from broad Lycia and setting them in ambush.

None returned home; blameless Bellerophon killed them all. At last, knowing that he was the dear son of a god, the king held him there, gave him his daughter, and granted him half the royal honor.

The Lycians cut out for him a beautiful estate, rich in orchard and plowland, that he might possess it.

“His wife bore three children to brave Bellerophon: Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodameia. Zeus who counsels all lay with Laodameia, and she bore godlike Sarpedon, armed in bronze. But when Bellerophon became hated by all the gods, he wandered alone across the Aleian plain, eating his heart and shunning the paths of

men.
Ares, insatiable in war, killed his son Isander as he fought the glorious Solymi;
Artemis of the golden reins, angered, killed Laodameia. Hippolochus fathered me,
and from him I say that I was born.
He sent me to Troy with many commands: always to be best and excel all others, never to shame the blood of my fathers, who were the greatest in Ephyre and in broad Lycia. Of this lineage and blood I boast.”
Diomedes rejoiced when he heard him, planted his spear in the earth, and answered the shepherd of the people with gentle words: “Then you are an ancient guest-friend of my father’s house. Noble Oeneus once entertained blameless Bellerophon in his halls for twenty days, and they exchanged beautiful guest-gifts: Oeneus gave a bright purple belt, and Bellerophon a golden, two-handled cup. I left that cup at home when I came here. I do not remember Tydeus, for I was still a child when the Achaean perished at Thebes. So now I am your guest-friend in Argos, and you mine in Lycia, if ever I come among that people. Let us avoid each other’s spears in the crowd; there are Trojans and famous allies enough for me to kill, whom some god may place in my path, and Achaeans enough for you to kill, if you can. Let us exchange armor, so that these men may know that we boast of being our fathers’ guest-friends.”

They spoke, leapt down from their chariots, clasped one another’s hands, and pledged their faith. But Zeus, son of Cronus, stole Glaucus’ understanding; he exchanged golden armor for bronze, the price of a hundred cattle for the price of nine.
Hector reached the Scaean gates and the beech tree, and the wives and daughters of the Trojans ran around him, asking after their children, brothers,
friends,
and husbands. He told them all to pray to the gods, for sorrow had fallen heavily upon them. When he came to Priam’s splendid house, built with polished porticoes, he found fifty chambers of hewn stone, set close together, where the king’s sons slept beside their wedded wives; and across the court stood twelve roofed chambers for his daughters and their husbands.

There his gentle mother met him, bringing Laodice, the fairest of her daughters.
She took his hand and called him by name: “My child, why have you left the fierce battle? Are the hateful sons of the Achaeans
pressing hard around the city, and has your heart sent you here from the wall's edge to lift your hands to Zeus?
Wait, and I will bring you honey-sweet wine, that you may pour a libation first to father Zeus and the other immortals, and then refresh yourself if you drink. Wine gives great strength to a weary man, and you are weary from defending your companions.”
Great-helmed Hector answered: “Do not bring me honeyed wine, revered mother, lest you weaken my limbs and make me forget my strength. I am ashamed to pour bright wine to Zeus with unwashed hands, and it is not lawful to pray to the dark-clouded son of Cronus while stained with blood and filth. Go instead to Athena's temple, gathering the old women of the city. Take the robe that seems to you the most beautiful and largest in the house, the one most dear to her, and lay it upon the knees of the fair-haired goddess.

Promise twelve yearling heifers, never yet broken to the goad, if she will pity the city, the wives of Troy, and their children,
and keep the fierce spear of Tydeus' son from sacred Ilium. I will seek Paris and call him, if he will listen. Would that the earth might open and swallow
him!
The Olympian has bred him as a great plague to Troy, to Priam, and to his sons;
if I saw him going down to Hades, I think my spirit might forget its grief.”
His mother went into the perfumed chamber and called her attendants; they gathered the old women throughout the city.
Hecuba descended to the chamber where lay the embroidered robes made by Sidonian women, whom godlike Alexander had brought from Sidon across the wide sea by the same route on which he carried Helen, high-born daughter of Tyndareus. She lifted one robe, most beautiful in its pattern and the largest of all, shining like a star, and lying beneath the others. With it she went,
and many aged women followed.
When they reached Athena's temple on the city's height,

Theano, fair-cheeked daughter of Cisseus and wife of horse-taming Antenor, opened the doors; the Trojans had made her priestess of Athena. All raised their hands with the ritual cry. Theano took the robe and laid it upon the knees of the fair-haired goddess, praying: "Lady Athena, glorious among goddesses, break Diomedes' spear, and make him fall forward before the Scaean gates. Then we will sacrifice twelve yearling heifers in your temple, if you will pity the city, the wives of Troy, and their little children." So she prayed, but Pallas Athena turned her face away.
Hector went to the beautiful house of Paris, built by the best craftsmen of fertile Troy beside the houses of Priam and Hector. He entered with his eleven-cubit spear in his hand, the bronze point shining before him and the golden socket running around it.
Paris was there, putting on his fine armor, shield and breastplate, and bending his curved bow; Argive Helen sat among her maidservants, directing their famous work. Hector rebuked
him:
"Strange man, you nurse this anger in your heart while the people perish around the steep wall. For your sake battle and war have kindled this city; you yourself would fight another if you saw him shrinking from the hateful war. Rise, before the enemy's fire consumes the town." Godlike Paris answered: "Hector, you have rebuked me justly, and not beyond what is just. I did not sit here from anger toward the Trojans, but because I wished to yield to grief. My wife has urged me toward the battle with gentle words, and I too think it is better.

Wait a little; I will put on my armor, or go ahead, and I will soon catch
you."
Hector did not answer him. Helen spoke to Hector with gentle words:
"Brother of my husband, dog that I am, full of hateful contrivance!
Would that the storm had carried me away on the day my mother bore me, to mountain or wave-beaten sea, before these deeds were born. But since the gods have appointed these evils, would that I had been the wife of a better man, one who knew the shame and many reproaches of men.
This man has no steady mind now, nor will he have one later; I think he will reap what he has sown. Come in and sit upon this bench, my brother, since the labor has weighed most heavily upon your
heart,

because of me, hateful as I am, and because of Alexander's ruin. Zeus set this evil fate upon us, that we should be sung as a song for generations yet to come."

Great-helmed Hector answered: "Do not ask me to sit, Helen, though you love me;

you will not persuade me. My heart already urges me to defend the Trojans, who long for me while I am gone. Stir this man, and let him hurry, so that he may find me still within the city. I will go home too, to see my wife and my little son; for I do not know whether I shall return to them again, or whether the gods

will bring me down beneath Achaean hands."

He spoke and left. At once he reached his well-inhabited house, but did not find

Andromache in the hall. She had gone with her child and a richly dressed attendant to the great tower, lamenting and grieving. Hector stood at the threshold and asked the servants: "Tell me truly: where has white-armed Andromache gone from the house?

Has she gone to my sisters or my brothers' well-robed wives, or to Athena's temple, where the other fair-haired Trojan women seek to appease the dreadful goddess?"

The busy housekeeper answered:

"Since you command me to tell the truth, she has gone neither to your sisters nor to your brothers' wives, nor to Athena's temple where the women pray. She heard that the Trojans were worn down and that the

Achaean strength had grown great; she hurried to the wall like a mad woman,

and her nurse carried the child with her."

Hector ran out of the house and back through the well-built streets. As he passed

the gates, where he was about to cross into the plain, his richly gifted wife

Andromache came running to meet him, daughter of great-hearted Eetion, who dwelt beneath wooded Placus in Thebe of Cilicia. She had been Hector's wife.

Her attendant carried at her breast their little child, beloved Astyanax, whom Hector called

Scamandrius, while all others called him Astyanax, "lord of the city," for alone defended Ilium.
Hector

Hector smiled silently when he saw the child. Andromache came close, shedding tears,

took his hand, and called him: "Your own strength will destroy you, pitiless man;

you have no pity for your little child or for me, soon to be your widow.

The Achaeans

will soon kill you, all rushing upon you together. It would be better for me, if I lose you, to go beneath the earth; I shall have no other comfort once you meet your fate, only sorrow. I have no father or honored mother. Achilles killed my father,

and sacked high-gated Thebe, the well-inhabited city of Cilicia. He killed Eetion,

but did not strip him, for he feared to do that in his heart; he burned him in his beautiful armor and raised a mound over him, and the mountain nymphs, daughters of aegis-bearing Zeus, planted elms around it. I had seven brothers in the house;

all went down to Hades on one day, for swift-footed Achilles killed them among their shambling cattle and white sheep. He carried away my mother, who ruled beneath wooded Placus, with the rest of the spoil, then released her for a measureless ransom;

but Artemis of the bow struck her down in the house of my father.

“Hector, you are now my father, honored mother, brother, and strong husband. Come,

then, pity me and stay here upon the tower; do not make your child an orphan and your wife a widow. Set the army beside the fig tree, where the city is easiest to climb

and the wall most open to attack.

Three times the best of them have tried that place, around both Ajaxes, glorious Idomeneus, the Atrids, and the brave son of Tydeus—

perhaps some prophet told them, or perhaps their own courage drove them on.”

Great-helmed Hector answered: “All this lies within my heart, woman.

But I would be deeply ashamed before the Trojans and their trailing-robed wives if I shrank from the battle like a coward. My spirit does not allow it; I have learned to be brave and to fight always among the first Trojans, winning great glory for my father and myself.

For I know this surely in my mind and heart: the day will come when sacred Ilium,

Priam, and the people of Priam, strong in the spear, will all be destroyed. But the future grief of the Trojans, of Hecuba herself, of lord Priam, and of my many brave brothers when they fall in the dust beneath hostile men does not pain me so much as yours, when some bronze-clad Achaean leads you away weeping, taking your free day from you. In Argos you will weave at another woman's loom, or carry water from

Messeis or Hypereia, unwilling, and harsh necessity will lie upon you.
Then someone may see you in tears and say: 'There is the wife of Hector, who was best in battle among the horse-taming Trojans when they fought around Ilium.' So he will speak, and your grief will be new, lacking such a husband to ward off the day of slavery.
May the piled earth cover me dead before I hear your cry and see you dragged away." When he had spoken, glorious Hector reached toward his child; but the boy turned back toward the nurse's richly belted breast, crying, frightened by his dear father's appearance and by the bronze and the horsehair crest nodding terribly from the top of the helmet. His father and honored mother laughed. At once Hector took the helmet from his head and set it shining upon the ground. He kissed his beloved son, rocked him in his arms, and prayed to Zeus and the other gods:
"Zeus and all gods, grant that this child may become, as I am, eminent among the Trojans, strong in courage, and rule Ilium by his might. May someone one day say, 'He is far better than his father,' when he returns from battle carrying the bloody armor of an enemy he has killed; and may his mother's heart rejoice." He placed the child in his dear wife's arms. She received him into her fragrant bosom, smiling through tears. Her husband pitied her, stroked her with his hand, and called her by name: "Dear one, do not grieve so deeply. No man can send me to Hades before my appointed portion; and no man, coward or brave, has ever escaped his fate once he was born. Go home, and tend to your own work, the loom and distaff, and command your attendants to keep at their labor. War shall be the concern of all the men born in Ilium, but most of all of me." He spoke and lifted the horsehair helmet. His wife went home, turning often to look back and shedding tears; the attendants raised a common lament, believing Hector would not return from battle. Paris did not linger in his high house.

Once he had put on his shining armor, he hurried through the city, bright as a well-fed horse that breaks its tether and runs proudly to the river. He soon found his noble brother as Hector was turning away from the place where he had spoken with his wife.

“Brother,” Paris said, “I have detained you by waiting, and have not come as quickly as you commanded.” Hector answered: “No decent man could despise your work in battle, for you are strong; but you hold back by choice, and my heart aches when I hear the shame the Trojans endure because of you. Come. We shall make amends, if Zeus ever grants us to raise a mixing bowl in the halls of heaven after victory.”

Source range: Book 6. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Hector reaches toward Astyanax beside Andromache

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 7

First-pass working translation

Hector sprang from the gates, and Alexander followed him, both eager to fight. As when a god gives wind to sailors who have labored across the sea, their limbs worn out with toil, so the two appeared to the Trojans,
longing for battle. They killed Menesthius, son of the club-bearing
king Areithous, and Hector struck Eionaeus beneath the bronze rim of his helmet, loosening his knees. Glaucus, son of Hippolochus and leader of the Lycians, hit Iphinous, son of Dexias, as he leapt upon his swift horses, and brought him down with his shoulder pierced.
Gray-eyed Athena saw the Argives falling in the hard battle and rushed
down from Olympus toward sacred Ilium.
Apollo, watching from Pergamus and wishing victory for the Trojans, rose to meet her beside the beech tree. Apollo spoke:
“Why have you come in such eagerness from Olympus, daughter of great Zeus?
Do you mean to give the Danaans a victory that turns the battle? You do not pity the Trojans as they perish. If you would listen, it would be far better: let us stop the war and slaughter for today; afterward they may fight again until they find the appointed end of Ilium, since it is dear to both of us to destroy this city.” Athena answered: “Let it be so, Far-shooter. I too came from Olympus with that purpose, between the Trojans and Achaeans. But tell me how you mean to end the fighting.” Apollo said: “Let us rouse Hector’s strong heart, that he may challenge one of the Danaans to stand alone against him in the hateful battle. Then the bronze-greaved Achaeans, angered, will send one champion against godlike Hector.”

Athena agreed. Helenus, Priam’s beloved son, understood the counsel that pleased the gods, came to Hector, and said: “Hector, son of Priam, equal to Zeus in counsel, will you listen to me, your brother? Make all the Trojans
and Achaeans sit, and call one of the Danaans, the best he can be, to fight you face to face. You are not yet fated to die; so I heard the voice of the ever-living gods.”
Hector rejoiced at the word. He went into the midst of the Trojan
ranks,

grasped his spear at its center, and halted the whole line. Agamemnon seated the well-greaved Achaeans; Athena and silver-bowed Apollo sat like vultures upon the high beech of aegis-bearing Zeus, delighting in the men below.
The ranks sat close in the plain, bristling with shields, helmets, and spears,
like the ripples that Zephyr pours newly over the sea, darkening the water.
Hector spoke between the two armies: "Hear me, Trojans and well-greaved Achaeans, while I say what my heart commands. High-seated Zeus has not made our oaths come to fulfillment; instead he devises evil for both sides, until either you take well-walled Troy, or you yourselves are overcome beside the sea-going ships.
Among you are the best of all the Pan-Achaeans. Let whichever man's heart urges him to fight Hector come here and stand before me.
"I speak this, and let Zeus be our witness. If he kills me with the long-edged bronze, let him strip my armor and carry it to the hollow ships; but let him return my body, so that the Trojans and their wives may give me the portion of fire after death. If I kill him, and Apollo gives me glory, I will strip his

armor,
carry it to sacred Ilium, and hang it in the temple of far-shooting Apollo; but I will give his body back to the well-benched ships, that the long-haired Achaeans may bury him and raise his mound beside the broad Hellespont. Then some man of the generations yet to come, sailing the wine-dark sea in a many-oared ship, will say: 'This is the grave of a man who died long ago, whom glorious killed when he excelled in battle.' So men will speak, and my fame shall never die."
Hector
All fell silent. They were ashamed to refuse, yet afraid to accept the challenge.
At last Menelaus rose and rebuked them: "Ah me, Achaean women, no longer Achaeans!
This will be a shame beyond measure if no Danaan now goes against Hector. May you all become water and earth, sitting here without spirit or glory; I myself will arm against him, though the ends of victory lie with the immortal gods." He began to put on his beautiful armor, but then his brother Agamemnon seized him by the right hand and said: "You are mad, Menelaus, beloved of Zeus.
Rise, though you grieve, and do not choose to fight Hector, the son of Priam, a better man whom others hate. Even Achilles feared to meet him in the man-making battle, though he is far stronger than you. Sit now among your companions; the Achaeans will raise another champion. However fearless and tireless he is, I say that his knee will bend gladly if he escapes the enemy and the terrible fighting.” His brother persuaded him with words that were just, and willing attendants removed the armor from his shoulders. Then Nestor rose and cried: “What grief has come upon the Achaean land! Old horseman Peleus, counselor and speaker of the Myrmidons, would groan if he heard that all the best Argives now shrink beneath Hector.

 I wish I were young again, as when the Pylians and spear-famed Arcadians gathered beside the walls of Phea and I fought godlike Ereuthalion, wearing the armor of King Areithous, whom men and women called the Club-bearer because he broke the ranks with an iron club, not with bow or long spear. Lycurgus killed him by ambush in a narrow road, striking him through before the club could help him, then stripped the armor which brazen Ares had given him. In his old age Lycurgus gave it to his beloved servant Ereuthalion, who challenged every champion while wearing it. All trembled and refused, but my own heart urged me to fight; I was the youngest of them all, and Athena gave me glory.

 I killed that great and strongest man, and his huge body lay stretched in the dust.
 If only I were young again, and my strength were still firm, Hector would soon find an opponent. Yet not one of you, the best of the Pan-Achaeans, comes willingly against him.”
 The old man’s rebuke made all nine rise: first Agamemnon, then strong Diomedes,
 the two Ajaxes in their warlike strength, Idomeneus and his companion Meriones, Eurypylus, son of Euaemon, Thoas son of Andraemon, and godlike Odysseus. All wished to fight Hector. Nestor told them to cast lots straight through a helmet, for the chosen man would benefit the well-greaved Achaeans and himself, if he escaped the enemy and the dreadful battle. Each marked his lot and dropped it into Agamemnon’s helmet. The army prayed, lifting their hands to heaven: “Father Zeus, let Ajax, or the son of Tydeus, or the king of gold-rich Mycenae draw the lot.”

Nestor shook the helmet, and out sprang the lot they wanted: Ajax's.
The herald carried it through the crowd and showed it from right to left to each champion, but none knew
it. When he came to Ajax, who had marked and placed it in the helmet, Ajax stretched out his hand and recognized the sign.
He threw the lot at his feet and said:
"Friends,
the lot is mine; my heart rejoices, for I think I shall overcome godlike Hector. Bring me my warlike armor while you pray to Zeus, son of Cronus—silently, so the Trojans do not hear, or openly, for I fear no man. No one shall drive me unwillingly from the fight by strength or skill; I do not think I was born and raised so helplessly in Salamis."
Ajax armed himself in flashing bronze. When he had clothed his body in every piece, he sprang forward like enormous Ares going to war among men whom the son of Cronus has joined in a devouring quarrel. So Ajax rose, the giant rampart of the Achaeans, smiling with a terrible face, taking long strides and shaking his long-shadowed spear. The Argives rejoiced to see him; dread seized every Trojan, and Hector's own heart beat hard.
Yet he could neither draw back nor hide among his people, for he himself had called the champion forth.

Ajax came near carrying a shield like a tower, bronze-faced and sevenfold in hide, which Tychius, best of leather-workers, had made for him in Hyle. Seven hides of well-fed bulls were sewn together, and over them he had hammered an eighth layer of bronze. Telamonian Ajax held it before his chest and stood close to Hector:
"Hector, you shall learn plainly, standing alone, what champions the Danaans have,
and that there are many such even after Achilles, the lion-hearted breaker of ranks.
He lies beside the curved ships in anger against Agamemnon, shepherd of the people;
but we are here, many enough to meet you. Begin the battle and war." Great-helmed Hector answered: "Do not test me, son of Telamon, as though I were a helpless child or a woman who knows nothing of war. I know how to fight and kill;
I know how to wield the hide shield to right and left, and how to leap into the tumult of swift horses. I know how to dance in the close battle of dreadful Ares.
Yet I will not strike you secretly while watching my chance; I will strike openly,

if I can.”

He balanced his long-shadowed spear and hurled it. It struck the terrible sevenfold shield at its highest bronze layer, the eighth surface, and the tireless metal cut through six hides before the seventh held it. Ajax then threw his long-shadowed spear
and struck Priam’s son on his perfectly round shield. The mighty point passed through the bright shield and lodged in the richly wrought breastplate, tearing the tunic beside his flank; Hector bent aside and avoided black death. Both drew out their long spears and fell upon one another like lions that eat raw flesh, or boars whose strength is not easily broken.
Hector stabbed the center of Ajax’s shield, but the bronze bent at the point and did not break through. Ajax leapt and thrust; his spear passed across the shield, drove Hector backward, cut his neck, and black blood spurted. Yet Hector did not stop.
He drew back and seized a great rough black stone that lay in the plain, and hurled it at the terrible shield’s central boss; the bronze rang around it. Ajax raised a still larger stone, whirled it, and drove it against Hector’s shield. The millstone-

shaped rock broke the shield inward and wounded Hector’s knees; he lay stretched backward, pinned beneath it. But Apollo quickly raised him. They would have fought at close quarters with swords, had not the heralds, messengers of Zeus and of men, come between them.

At last Idaeus for the Trojans and Talthybius for the bronze-clad Achaeans came between them, both wise heralds, and held their staffs between the champions.

Idaeus spoke: “Do not fight any longer, dear sons; do not make war.
Zeus who gathers the clouds loves you both, and both are spearmen—we all know that. Night has already come; it is good to obey the night.”

Telamonian Ajax answered: “Idaeus, tell Hector to say this. He himself called all our champions forth. Let him begin, and I will gladly obey whatever he says.”

Hector replied: “Ajax, since the god has given you great size, strength, and wisdom, and you are the best of the Achaeans with the spear, let us now stop the battle and slaughter for today. Later we shall fight again until the god separates us and gives victory to another. Night has come; it is good to obey the night. So you may make all your friends rejoice beside the ships, above all your companions and dear comrades; and I will gladden the Trojans and their trailing-robed wives in Priam's great city, who will enter the sacred contest and pray for my return.

Come, then,
let us give one another famous gifts, so that Achaeans and Trojans may say: 'They fought in the spirit of consuming strife, yet parted after joining in friendship.'" Hector gave Ajax a silver-studded sword with its sheath and a finely cut baldric; Ajax gave Hector his bright purple war-belt. They parted, one going among the Achaean people and the other into the Trojan tumult. The Trojans rejoiced when they saw Hector alive and whole, escaped from Ajax's strength and unwearied hands;
they led him toward the city, no longer expecting to see him safe. The well-greaved Achaeans brought Ajax, exultant in victory, to the noble Agamemnon.
The Achaeans gathered in Agamemnon's hut, and the lord of men sacrificed a five-year-old bull to mighty Zeus.
They flayed it, divided it, cut it into pieces, roasted it carefully, and laid out the meal. When their hunger and thirst were satisfied, Agamemnon honored Ajax with the long back portions.

Then Nestor,
whose counsel had always been best, began to weave his plan:
"Atrid and all you champions of the Pan-Achaeans, many long-haired
Achaeans
have died; sharp Ares has scattered their dark blood around the flowing Scamander,
and their spirits have gone down to Hades. At dawn stop the battle. Let us gather the dead here with oxen and mules, burn them a little before the ships, so that each man may carry his bones home when we return to his fatherland. Let us raise one mound around a common pyre, bringing the bodies in from the plain, and quickly build high towers beside it as a defense for the ships and ourselves. Let us make doors fitted within them, that chariots may pass through, and outside dig a deep trench to hold back horses and men, lest the war of the proud Trojans press upon us." All the kings praised his counsel. In high Ilium, meanwhile, the Trojans gathered in a rough assembly before Priam's doors. Wise Antenor spoke first:
"Hear me, Trojans, Dardanians, and allies. Let us give Helen of Argos, and the possessions she brought, to the sons of Atreus. We have broken our faithful oaths and fight for nothing; I do not expect a good end unless we do this.”

He sat down. Godlike Alexander, husband of fair-haired Helen, rose
and answered:

“Antenor, your words are no longer pleasing to me; you could have devised a better speech. If you truly speak this in earnest, the gods themselves have destroyed your mind. I will declare my answer to the horse-taming Trojans: I will not give back the woman, but all the possessions I brought from Argos I will give, and I will add other treasures from my own house.”

He sat down, and Priam, son of Dardanus, equal to the gods in counsel, rose and told the Trojans: “Take your supper through the city as before, remember the watch, and stay awake, each man. At dawn let Idaeus go to the hollow ships and tell the Atrids,

Agamemnon and Menelaus, Alexander’s answer—the cause of our strife. Let him also ask whether they will cease from the harsh war until we have burned the dead. Later we shall fight again, until the god separates us and gives victory to others.”

The Trojans listened and obeyed.
Idaeus went at dawn to the Achaean ships and found the sons of Atreus in council.

Standing among them, he declared Alexander’s offer:

“He will not return Helen, but he will return all the possessions he brought from

Argos and add more from his own house, if the sons of Atreus will accept them.”

All sat silent, until Agamemnon answered: “No; we will not accept the possessions, nor will we accept Helen. The Trojans have suffered enough already to understand that their ruin is near.”

The Trojans took their supper through the army, and at dawn Idaeus went to the hollow ships. He found the Danaans assembled beside Agamemnon’s stern and stood

among them to deliver the proposal: “Atrid and other champions of the Pan-Achaeans,

Priam and the noble Trojans have ordered me to say, if it is pleasing to you, what

Alexander offers, for whose sake the quarrel arose. He will give back all the goods

he brought to Troy in the hollow ships—and add other possessions from his own house;

but he will not return Menelaus’ wedded wife, though the Trojans urge him. They also ask whether you will cease the harsh war until we have burned the dead; afterward

we shall fight again until the god separates us and gives victory to
others.”

All were silent. At last Diomedes, breaker of horses, spoke: “Let no one accept

Alexander’s possessions or Helen; even a child can see that the end of destruction

already hangs over the Trojans.” All the Achaeans shouted approval.

Agamemnon turned to Idaeus: “You hear the answer of the Achaeans yourself. I also approve it. We do not refuse to burn the dead; no one should spare the bodies once life is gone. Let

Zeus, the loud-thundering husband of Hera, witness our oaths.” He lifted his staff to all the gods, and Idaeus returned to sacred Ilium.

The Trojans and Dardanians sat gathered in assembly, waiting for Idaeus. He came and told them the answer. At once both sides armed: some went to bring in the dead, others went for wood. The sun had only just touched the fields, rising from deep-

flowing Ocean, when the armies met.

It was hard to recognize each man; washing away

the blood with water, they lifted the dead upon the wagons, shedding hot tears.

Great Priam forbade the Trojans to weep: silently, hearts grieving, they carried their dead to the pyre, burned them, and returned to sacred Ilium. In the same way

the well-greaved Achaeans carried their dead, burned them, and went back to the hollow ships.

Before dawn, while the night was still dim, the Achaeans gathered around the pyre.

They raised one mound from the bodies brought in from the plain, built a wall beside it with high towers as a defense for the ships and themselves, made well-fitted gates for the chariot road, and dug a broad, deep trench outside, setting stakes within it.

The long-haired Achaeans labored at the work. The gods, seated beside Zeus who delights in lightning, watched the great work of the bronze-clad men.

Earth-shaking

Poseidon began to speak:

“Father Zeus, is there still a mortal who will tell the gods his mind and counsel?

Do you not see how the long-haired Achaeans have built a wall over their ships and dug a trench around it, giving no famous hecatombs to the gods? Its fame will spread as far as the dawn, while men will forget the wall that Phoebus Apollo and I built with labor for Laomedon.”

Zeus, deeply angered, answered:

“What a thought you have spoken, wide-strength Earth-shaker! Some other god, far weaker than you in hands and strength, might fear it;

but your fame will spread as far as the dawn. When the long-haired Achaeans depart with their ships for their dear fatherland, tear down the wall and pour it all into the sea; cover the broad shore again with sand, so that the Achaeans' great wall may be wholly forgotten.” Thus they spoke. The sun set, and the Achaeans' work was finished.
They sacrificed oxen among the huts and took their supper. Many ships came from Lemnos bringing wine, sent by Euneus, son of Jason and Hypsipyle. For Agamemnon and Menelaus alone he sent a thousand measures of wine. The long-haired Achaeans bought it, some with bronze, some with shining iron, some with hides, some with whole cattle, and some with slaves; they laid out a rich feast. All night the Achaeans feasted, while the Trojans and their allies sat through the city. All night Zeus, the counselor, devised evil for them, thundering terribly; green fear seized them, and they poured wine from their cups upon the ground, unwilling to drink before they had poured a libation to mighty

Cronus' son. Then they slept and received the gift of sleep.

Source range: Book 7. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Hector and Ajax lower their shields beneath the evening truce

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 8

First-pass working translation

Dawn spread her saffron robe across the earth, and Zeus, delighting in thunder, called the gods to council on the highest peak of many-ridged Olympus. He spoke, and all the gods listened: "Hear me, every god and goddess, while I say what my heart commands. Let no female or male god attempt to break my word; all together approve it, that I may bring this work to its swift end. If I see any one of you going apart from the others to aid either Trojans or Danaans, he shall return to Olympus beaten and dishonored, or I will seize him and throw him into misty Tartarus, far down, where the iron gates and brazen threshold lie as far beneath Hades as heaven is above the earth. Then you will learn how much I am the strongest of all.
"Come, test it, gods, so that you may all know. Hang a golden chain from heaven,
and take hold of it, every god and goddess together; you could not drag highest Zeus from heaven to earth, though you labored greatly. But if I wished to pull,

I could draw you up with the earth and the sea, bind the chain around the ridge of Olympus, and leave all things suspended. So far do I stand above gods and men."
He spoke, and all sat silent, astonished by the force of his word.
At last gray-eyed Athena said: "Our father, son of Cronus, you know that your strength cannot be opposed. Yet we pity the spear-bearing Danaans, who will perish in an evil fate.
We will keep away from the war as you command, but we will give the Argives counsel that may help them, lest they all perish beneath your anger." Cloud-gathering Zeus smiled and answered: "Take courage, Tritogeneia, dear child; I do not speak in anger, but wish to be gentle with you." He harnessed his bronzehoofed horses with their golden manes, clothed his body in gold, seized the golden whip, and mounted the chariot. The willing horses flew between earth
and the starry heaven. He reached Ida, rich in springs, mother of wild beasts, and Gargarus,
where he had a sacred grove, altar, and incense. There the father of gods and men unharnessed the horses, hid them in deep mist, and sat upon the peak in his glory,

looking toward the city of Troy and the Achaean ships.

The long-haired Achaeans took their meal quickly among the huts and armed themselves;

the Trojans armed throughout the city, fewer than before, yet determined by necessity to fight before their children and wives. All the gates opened, and footmen and horsemen rushed out amid a great uproar. When they met in one place, hide struck hide,

spear struck spear, and the courage of bronze-clad men collided. The bossed shields crashed together; cries rose from those who killed and those who died, and the earth

ran with blood.

As the sacred day grew, missiles struck both sides and men fell. When the sun stood at mid-heaven, Zeus stretched out his golden scales and set in them the two fates of death, one for the horse-taming Trojans and one for the bronze-clad Achaeans.

He lifted the balance at its middle:
the Achaeans' day sank toward the earth,

while the Trojan fate rose toward the broad heaven. Zeus thundered terribly from

Ida and cast a blazing flash among the Achaeans; they were seized by green fear.

Neither Idomeneus nor Agamemnon, nor either Ajax, dared remain; only Nestor stayed, not willingly, for an arrow shot by Paris, husband of fair-haired Helen, struck his horse at the top of its head where the first mane grows, the most vulnerable place.

The horse sprang in pain; the shaft entered its brain, and it tangled the
others

in the bronze. While the old man cut the traces with his sword, Hector's swift

horses came through the uproar carrying their driver, and the old man would have lost his life had Diomedes not seen him. Diomedes cried to Odysseus:

"Son of Laertes, where do you flee, turning your back like a coward?

Beware lest a spear be planted in your fleeing back; stand here with me,

That we may drive this savage man away from the old king."

But Odysseus did not hear; he ran toward the hollow ships.

Then Diomedes himself joined the foremost fighters, stood before Nestor's horses,

And called: "Old man, the young warriors wear you down; your strength is gone,

And age has come upon you. Your servant is weak, and your horses slow.

Come, mount my chariot, and see what Trojan horses can do—

How swiftly they pursue and flee across the plain. I took them from Aeneas.

Let my servants tend to yours; we two will drive against the horse-tamers,
And learn whether Hector will meet us.”

Hector urged the Trojans: “Fools, who devised this wall, weak and useless!

It will not hold back my strength; our horses will easily leap the trench.
When I reach the hollow ships, remember the fire: I will burn them and kill the Argives beside them, choking in the smoke.” He called to his horses—Xanthus, Podargus, Aethon, and divine Lampus—and told them to repay the rich fodder and wine Andromache, daughter of Eetion, had given them in former days. If they drove swiftly, he said, they might seize Nestor’s shield, all gold in its hoops and boss, and Diomedes’ wrought breastplate, made by Hephaestus; then the Achaean might board their ships that very night.

Hera shook her throne in anger and said to Poseidon: “Earth-shaker, do you feel no pity for the dying Danaans, who carry many beautiful gifts to Helice and Aegae? If we who aid the Argives wished, we could drive back the Trojans and hold off Zeus.”

Poseidon answered: “Bold Hera, what word is this? I would not fight Zeus, who is far stronger than all of us.”

Hector’s men and horses filled the space between the ships and the trench, penned in by the deep cut ground. Hector, favored by Zeus, would have set fire to the ships,

but Hera put a new thought into Agamemnon’s mind. He took a great purple cloak,

went through the huts and ships, and stood upon Odysseus’ black ship, midway between the tents of Ajax and Achilles. With his voice carrying both ways he cried: “Shame, Argives, beautiful in form but evil in reproach! Where are your boasts, when on Lemnos you claimed that each man could face a hundred or two hundred

Trojans? Now we are not worth even one Hector, who will soon burn the
ships.

Father Zeus, have you blinded some great king, robbing him of honor? I never passed your beautiful altar with a many-oared ship without burning the fat and thighs of oxen, eager to destroy well-walled Troy. Grant me at least this prayer: let the

Argives escape and not perish, though you allow the Trojans to overcome them.”

The father pitied him, shedding a tear, and nodded that the people should live and not be destroyed. At once he sent the most perfect of flying birds, an eagle carrying a fawn in its talons. He dropped it beside Zeus' beautiful altar where the Achaean made sacrifice. When they saw the bird from Zeus, they leapt more fiercely against the Trojans and remembered their courage.

No one among the many Danaans dared drive his horses from the trench and fight before Diomedes. He was first to kill a helmeted Trojan, Agelaus son of Phradmon, striking him between the shoulders as he turned his horses; the spear passed through his chest, and his armor rang as he fell.
Agamemnon and Menelaus followed, then the two Ajaxes, Idomeneus and Meriones, Eurypylus, and Teucer ninth, drawing his recurved bow.
Ajax carried his shield before him; each time Teucer shot and felled a man, he slipped back beneath it like a child beneath its mother. Teucer first killed Orsilochus, Ormenus, Opheltes, Daitor, Chromius, Lycophontes, Amopaon, and Melanippus.
Agamemnon rejoiced and called:
"Teucer, beloved head, son of Telamon, lord of the people, shoot so that you become a light to the Danaans and to your father who raised you from childhood, though you were born outside the marriage bed.

Give him fame though he is far away; I tell you how it shall be fulfilled." Teucer answered: "Most glorious Atreid, why urge me when I am already eager? Since we drove them back toward Ilium I have not stopped, but have killed eight men with my long-tongued arrows. Yet I cannot strike this rabid dog." He sent another shaft at Hector, but Apollo turned it aside; it struck Archeptolemus, Hector's brave charioteer, in the chest beside the breast. He fell from the car, and his horses sprang
away.
Hector grieved terribly for his companion, yet left him lying and told his brother Kebriones to take the reins. Then Hector leapt from the chariot with a dreadful cry, seized a jagged stone, and rushed upon Teucer.
Teucer drew a bitter arrow and bent the bow, but as he pulled it beside the shoulder, where the collarbone guards the neck, Hector struck him with the stone. The cord broke, his hand went numb, and he fell upon his knees; the bow dropped from him. Ajax did not forget his brother: he ran around him and covered him with the bright shield, while two faithful companions, Mecisteus and Alastor, lifted the groaning man and carried

him to the hollow ships.
The Olympian roused the Trojans again. They drove the Achaeans straight toward the deep trench, and Hector went first, eyes blazing like Gorgon's and murderous Ares.
As a hound pursues a boar or lion from behind, darting at its hips and turning aside from its jaws, so Hector followed the long-haired Achaeans, killing the last man in the line. They crossed the stakes and trench in flight; many Trojans also fell beneath their hands, while the Achaeans held by the ships, calling to one another and lifting their hands to every god.
Hera pitied the Danaans and said to Athena: "Daughter of aegis-bearing
Zeus,
shall we no longer care for the dying Argives, who will perish by one man's assault, while Hector, son of Priam, rages beyond endurance?" Athena answered: "Would that he might lose his strength beneath Argive hands and die in his own land! But my father's mind is mad and cruel, always opposing my will. He remembers nothing of how often I saved his son Heracles from Eurystheus' labors. If I had known this day when he sent Heracles to fetch the hound from Hades, he would never have escaped the steep waters of Styx. Now he hates me, but has fulfilled Thetis' prayer, who kissed his knees and clasped his beard to honor city-sacking Achilles.

There will be a day when he calls his gray-eyed daughter dear again. Harness the horses; I will arm in Zeus' house and see whether Hector rejoices when we appear in the fight, or whether his flesh feeds dogs and birds beside the Achaean ships." Hera harnessed her golden-maned horses, while Athena cast her embroidered robe at her father's feet, clothed herself in Zeus' battle-tunic, and took the great
spear
with which she breaks the ranks of heroes. Hera urged the team on. The gates of heaven opened of themselves, gates held by the Hours, who open and close the dense cloud over Olympus; through them the goddesses drove. But Zeus saw them from Ida and was fiercely angry. He sent golden-winged Iris with a message:
"Go quickly and turn them back. Do not let them come against the battle. I will lame their swift horses beneath the chariot, throw them from the car, and break their chariot; even after ten years their wounds would not heal if struck by my lightning.
Then Athena

will learn what it means to fight her father. I am less angry with Hera, for she always contradicts whatever I say.” Iris met them at Olympus and said: “Where are you hastening? The son of Cronus does not permit you to aid the Argives. He threatens to lame your horses, throw you from the car, and strike your chariot; even ten years would not heal the wounds. He says he is less angry with Hera, but calls you, Athena, a shameless dog if you dare raise your mighty spear against Zeus.” Hera answered: “Daughter of aegis-bearing Zeus, I will no longer let us fight the father for mortal men. Let one die and another live, whoever happens to meet his fate; let Zeus judge Trojans and Danaans according to his own heart.” She turned the horses back. The Hours unhitched them, tied them beneath ambrosial mists, and leaned the chariot against the shining wall. Hera and Athena sat upon golden chairs among the other gods, hearts wounded. Zeus drove from Ida to Olympus, where Earth-shaker Poseidon unharnessed his horses and placed the chariot beside the altar. Zeus sat on his golden throne, and Olympus shook beneath his feet. He saw Hera and Athena sitting apart and spoke: “Why are you so grieved? You did not tire of destroying Trojans in the man-making battle. Such is my strength and my unconquered hands that all the gods on Olympus could not turn me. Yet your limbs trembled before you saw war and its terrible work. If I had struck your horses with lightning, you would not have returned to Olympus for ten circling years.” The goddesses muttered together, devising evil for Troy. Athena sat silent, angry with her father; Hera could not contain her resentment: “Most terrible son of Cronus, we know your strength is not weak. Yet we pity the spear-bearing Danaans, who will perish in an evil fate. We will keep away from the war, if you command, but we will give the Argives counsel, lest they all perish beneath your anger.” Zeus answered: “Tomorrow you will see the mighty Cronus’ son destroy many Argives, if you wish, for strong Hector will not cease from war until swift-footed Peleus’ son rises beside the ships on the day the Achaeans fight around Patroclus’ body. So fate has ordained it. I do not care for your anger, even if you reach the furthest boundaries of earth and sea, where Iapetus and Cronus sit in Tartarus without the sun's light."

The sun's bright light sank into Ocean and drew black night across the grain-giving earth. The Trojans, unwilling, lost the day; but the Achaeans welcomed the triple-prayed-for darkness. Hector called the Trojan assembly apart from the ships, beside the swirling river, where the ground was clear of corpses. They climbed down from their horses and listened as Hector leaned upon his eleven-cubit spear, its bronze point shining and its golden socket running around it:

"Hear me, Trojans, Dardanians, and allies. I thought that before night fell we would destroy the ships and return to windy Ilium, but darkness came and saved the Argives and their ships beside the sea. Let us obey the black night. Prepare supper; loose the fair-haired horses and set fodder before them. Bring cattle and fat sheep from the city, and buy honey-sweet wine and bread from the houses; gather much wood, so that all night until early dawn we may burn many fires whose light reaches heaven, lest the long-haired Achaeans attempt flight across the broad sea in darkness.

"Let them not board their ships without a struggle. Let each carry home a wound, struck by arrow or sharp spear as he leaps aboard, so that every man may dread to bring tearful Ares against horse-taming Troy. Heralds should announce through the city that boys at the edge of manhood and gray-haired elders gather upon the towers built by the gods; let every woman kindle a great fire in her house, and let a firm watch stand, lest an ambush enter while the people are away. Let this speech stand sound for now; at dawn I will address the Trojans again. I hope, praying to Zeus and the other gods, to drive from here those dogs carried by the fates, driven to our ships. Tonight we guard ourselves; at first light we arm and wake sharp Ares beside the hollow ships. Tomorrow I shall learn whether strong Diomedes will drive me from the ships to the wall, or whether I will kill him with bronze and carry away his bloody armor. If only I were immortal and ageless, and honored as Athena and Apollo are honored, as this day has brought evil to the Argives!"

The Trojans shouted in answer. They loosed the sweating horses, tied them beside their chariots, and brought cattle, sheep, wine, bread, and wood swiftly from the city. They made perfect hecatombs to the immortals, but the winds carried the sweet smoke from the plain toward heaven; the blessed gods would not share it, for sacred Ilium, Priam, and Priam's strong people were hateful to them. The Trojans, confident in the war, sat all night beside their many fires. As stars appear around the bright moon when the sky is windless, and every peak, ridge, and hollow lies visible beneath the opened heaven, so the fires of the Trojans shone between the ships and the streams of Xanthus. A thousand fires burned upon the plain, and beside each sat fifty men in the firelight. Their horses cropped white barley and spelt beside the chariots,
waiting for the bright-throned dawn.

Source range: Book 8. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Zeus weighs the battle above Ida

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 9

First-pass working translation

The Trojans kept watch, but the Achaeans were held by a terrible companion, chill fear, and every champion lay beneath unbearable grief. As Boreas and Zephyr suddenly stir the fish-filled sea, raising black waves and scattering seaweed along the shore, so the Achaeans' hearts were torn within them. Agamemnon, pierced by great sorrow, called the leaders quietly to assembly and stood weeping like a dark-water spring pouring down a sheer rock:
"Friends, Zeus, son of Cronus, has bound me in ruinous delusion. Once he promised that we would sack well-walled Ilium and return; now he devises a hateful deception and commands me to go dishonored to Argos, having lost so many men. Come, let us obey my word: let us flee with our ships to our dear fatherland. We shall not take broad-streeted Troy." Diomedes rose: "Atrid, I will oppose you in your folly, as is lawful in assembly.
You once reproached my courage before the Danaans, but the young and old Argives know that this was false. Zeus gave you a scepter, honoring you above all, but did not give you the greatest strength. If your heart urges you to go, go: the road is open, and your many ships stand near the sea. Others of us will remain until we have sacked Troy. Sthenelus and I will fight until we find the end of Ilium, for we came here with a god." The Achaeans shouted approval.

Nestor rose: "Son of Tydeus, you are strong in war and best of your peers in counsel; no Achaean will find fault with your speech, but you have not reached its end. You are young enough to be my youngest son, yet you speak wisely to kings. Let us obey the black night, prepare supper, and set guards beside the dug trench. Then, Agamemnon, feast the elders; your huts are full of wine, and men will hear the counsel of whoever offers the best plan. Our enemies burn many fires near the ships; who could be glad? This night will either shatter the army or save it."
The kings obeyed. Agamemnon answered: "Old man, you have not lied in naming my error. I was blinded, and I do not deny it. I will appease Achilles with measureless ransom:

seven tripods, ten talents of gold, twenty shining cauldrons, twelve prize-winning horses, and seven skilled Lesbian women, with Briseis among them. I will swear that I never entered her bed. These shall be ready at once. If we sack Priam's city, Achilles may load his ship with gold and bronze, choose twenty Trojan women next to Helen in beauty, and take one of my three daughters to Peleus' house without brideprice. I will give him seven cities near the sea, whose people will honor him like a god. Let him submit; Hades is pitiless and unconquerable." Nestor, the Gerenian horseman, answered: "Most glorious son of Atreus,
lord of men, Agamemnon, the gifts are no longer hidden from Achilles.
Come, let us summon the men who will go swiftly to the son of Peleus.
Let Phoenix lead them, dear to Zeus; then great Ajax and shining Odysseus.
Let the heralds Odios and Eurybates go with them. Bring water for their
hands,
and command a holy silence, so that we may pray to Zeus, son of Cronus, if perhaps he will pity us." Everyone approved his word.
At once the heralds poured water over their hands. The young men crowned the mixing bowls with wine and served the cups, beginning with the customary offering.

When they had poured and drunk as much as their hearts desired, they set out from Agamemnon's shelter. Nestor gave each man many instructions, but most of all he charged Odysseus to persuade the blameless son of Peleus. They went beside the shore of the loud-roaring sea, praying earnestly to Earth-shaking Poseidon that they might easily bend the great heart of Aeacus' grandson.
They reached the huts and ships of the Myrmidons and found Achilles delighting his heart with a clear, beautiful, carefully wrought lyre, whose silver bridge he had taken from the spoils when he destroyed Eetion's city. With it he sang the famous deeds of men. Patroclus alone sat opposite him in silence, waiting for Achilles to finish his song.
Odysseus led the others forward.
They stood before him, and Achilles sprang up in astonishment, leaving the lyre and the seat where he had been sitting. Patroclus rose as well when he saw the men.
Achilles,
swift-footed, greeted them:
"Welcome. You have come as friends, though I am angry with the Achaeans; you are the dearest of all to me.”

He led them within and seated them on chairs spread with purple rugs.
Then he called to Patroclus, who stood nearby: “Set out a larger mixing bowl, son of Menoetius, and mix the wine stronger. These are the dearest men beneath my roof.”
Patroclus obeyed his beloved companion. He set a great chopping block in the glow of the fire, laid upon it the back of a sheep, the fat haunch of a goat, and the richly marbled chine of a well-fed pig. Automedon held the meat, while noble Achilles cut it; Patroclus, a man equal to the gods, kindled the great fire.
When the fire had burned the wood down and the flame faded, he spread the embers, stretched the spits above them, and sprinkled sacred salt. When the meat was roasted, he set it into baskets.
Patroclus distributed the bread in handsome baskets, while Achilles portioned the meat. He sat opposite godlike Odysseus
against the other wall, and commanded Patroclus to sacrifice the inner portions to the gods; Patroclus cast them into the fire. The guests reached toward
the food laid before them.

When they had put away their desire for food and drink, Ajax nodded to Phoenix, and noble Odysseus understood. He filled the cup, raised it toward Achilles, and spoke: “Hail, Achilles. Your feast is not lacking, whether in Agamemnon’s shelter or here, for there is abundant food to share. Yet we cannot give our minds to this lovely meal: a great disaster, heaven-nurtured, stands before our eyes, and we fear whether we shall save our well-benched ships or perish. The proud Trojans and their far-famed allies have camped close beside the ships and wall, lighting many fires.
They say they will not stop until they fall upon the black ships. Zeus, son of Cronus, flashes favorable signs for them; Hector, exulting in his great
strength, rages terribly, trusting in Zeus. He honors neither men nor gods, and ruinous madness has entered him. He prays for the holy Dawn to appear as quickly as possible, for he boasts that he will cut off the ships’ high sterns, burn the ships themselves with consuming fire, and kill the Achaeans beside them as they choke in the smoke.
“These threats I dread terribly in my heart, lest the gods fulfill them and it be our appointed fate to perish at Troy, far from horse-pasturing Argos. Rise, then,

if you are willing, even now, to rescue the sons of the Achaeans, worn down beneath the Trojans' uproar. Afterwards grief will be yours, and there is no remedy once the evil is done. Consider beforehand how you will ward the evil day from the Danaans.
"My dear friend, your father Peleus gave you this charge on the day he sent you from Phthia to Agamemnon: 'My son, Athena and Hera will grant you strength, if they will it; but keep your great-hearted spirit within your breast, for kindly fellowship is better. Abandon the quarrel that breeds evil, so that the Argives, young and old, may honor you more.' Thus the old man charged you, but you forget it.
Even now cease, and let go the anger that eats your heart. Agamemnon gives you worthy gifts if you will end your wrath. Hear me, and I will recount all the gifts Agamemnon promised in his shelter: seven tripods never placed upon the fire; ten talents of gold; twenty shining cauldrons; twelve horses that have won prizes with their feet; and seven

Lesbian women, skilled in excellent work, whom he took when you captured well-built Lesbos and who surpassed all the tribes of women in beauty. He will give these to you, and with them the girl Briseis whom he took from you. He will swear a great oath that he never climbed into her bed or joined with her, as is the custom between lord and woman.
"All these things will be here at once.
If the gods grant us to sack Priam's great city, when we divide the spoil among the Achaeans, you may enter your ship and load it with gold and bronze. You may choose twenty Trojan women, those who are fairest after Argive Helen. If we reach Achaean Argos, the rich breast of the land, you will be Agamemnon's son-in-law, and he will honor you as he honors Orestes, his beloved son, raised amid abundance. He has three daughters in his well-built
house:
Chrysothemis, Laodice, and Iphianassa. Whichever you wish, you may lead home to Peleus' house without bride-price, and he will give you wedding gifts such as no man has ever given his daughter. He will also give you seven well-inhabited cities:

Cardamyle, Enope, grassy Hire, sacred Pherae, deep-meadowed Antheia, lovely Aipeia, and vine-covered Pegasus. All lie near the sea, at the edge of sandy Pylos; in them live men rich in sheep and cattle, who will honor you like a god with gifts and under your scepter fulfill bright judgments.
“These things he will accomplish for you when you have let go your anger.
But if the son of Atreus is hateful to you in your heart, him and his gifts, then pity the other Achaeans, who are suffering throughout the camp and will honor you like a god. You would win immense glory from them now, for you could take Hector, who would come very near you with his deadly madness; he claims that no Danaans brought here in the ships
are his equal.” Achilles answered: “Odysseus, sprung from Zeus, son of Laertes, resourceful man,
I must answer plainly, just as I think, and just as it will be fulfilled, so that you will not sit beside me murmuring one after another from different directions.
That man is hateful to me as the gates of Hades who hides one thought in his heart and speaks another. I will tell you what seems best to me. I do not think I can persuade Agamemnon, son of Atreus, or the other Danaans, since there was no gratitude for my unceasing fight against the enemy. The same portion belongs to the one who stays and the one who fights hardest: coward and brave are held in equal honor, and both die alike, the man who has done nothing and the man who has labored much.

“There is no profit left for me, after I have suffered pain in my heart and always thrown my life into battle. Like a wingless bird that carries food to its fledglings whenever it catches it, and suffers for its labor, so I have spent many sleepless nights and passed bloody days fighting men for their wives. With my ships I have destroyed twelve cities, and on foot I say I have taken eleven in fertile Troy.
From all these I carried many beautiful treasures away and gave everything to Agamemnon, son of Atreus. He stayed behind beside the swift ships, received the goods, and distributed only a little; he kept much for himself. He gave the rest
as prizes to the best men and the kings, and their portions remain safe.
From me alone among the Achaeans he took the woman I loved, and now he keeps her. Let him lie beside her and be glad.

“Why must the Argives fight the Trojans? Why did the son of Atreus gather and lead the army here? Was it not for fair-haired Helen? Are the sons of Atreus the only men who love their wives? Every good and sensible man loves and cares for his own, as I loved her, though I won her by my spear. Now that he has taken my prize from my hands and deceived me, let him not try me again: I know him, and he will not persuade me.
Let him, with you and the other kings, devise how to ward the enemy fire from the ships. He has labored greatly without me: he built a wall and drove a broad, deep trench around it, planting stakes within. Yet even that cannot hold Hector, killer of men. While I fought among the Achaeans, Hector would not venture far from the wall, but came only as far as the Skaian Gates and the beech tree, where once he stood alone and barely escaped my attack.
“Now I do not wish to fight glorious Hector. Tomorrow I will sacrifice to Zeus and all the gods, draw my ships well down to the sea, and you will see them, if you care and if it concerns you, sailing at first light upon the fish-filled Hellespont, with men eager at the oars. If the famous Earth-shaker grants a fair voyage, on the third day I should reach fertile Phthia. I have much there, and much that I left behind in my ruinous journey. From here I will carry away gold, red bronze, well-girded women, and gray iron, all the shares I won.

But the prize he gave me, Agamemnon, son of Atreus, has taken back again in his arrogance. Tell him this openly, as I command,
so that the other Achaeans may also be angry if he hopes to deceive another Danaan, always wrapped in shamelessness.
Even if he were as bold as a dog, he would not dare look me in the face. I will neither plan with him nor do any work beside him. He deceived and wronged me; he will not deceive me again with words.
Enough for him.
Let him go his way; Zeus the counselor has robbed him of his wits.
“His gifts are hateful to me, and I value him at the price of a hair. Even if he gave me ten times, twenty times as much as he possesses now, and as much more as he might acquire—no matter how much flows into Orchomenus or Egyptian Thebes, where the greatest wealth lies in houses, with a hundred gates and two hundred men issuing from each with horses and chariots—even if he offered me as much sand and dust as there are, Agamemnon could not persuade my spirit until he paid back all the painful insult.

“I will not marry a daughter of Agamemnon, son of Atreus, not even if she rivaled golden Aphrodite in beauty and matched bright-eyed Athena in handiwork. Let him choose another Achaean, one suited to him and more kingly. If the gods save me and

I reach home, Peleus himself will find me a wife. There are many Achaean women in

Hellas and Phthia, daughters of the best men who guard their cities.
Whichever I wish,

I will make my beloved wife. My proud heart has long urged me to take a fitting bride and enjoy the possessions the old man Peleus won.

“Nothing is worth my life—not all the wealth they say lies in well-inhabited Ilium, the city that once lived in peace before the sons of Achaeans came, nor all that the stone threshold of Phoebus Apollo encloses in rocky Pytho. Cattle and fat sheep can be driven off; tripods and tawny horses can be acquired. But a man’s life cannot be won back, nor captured, once it has passed through the barrier of his teeth.

My mother, silver-footed Thetis, tells me that two fates carry me toward
death.

If I remain here and fight around the city of the Trojans, my homecoming is lost, but my glory will be imperishable. If I return home to my beloved fatherland, my good glory is lost, but my life will be long, and death’s end will not soon overtake

me. I would advise the others to sail home as well, since you will not find the end of steep Ilium: Zeus of the wide eyes has stretched his hand above it, and its people have taken courage.

“Go, then, and tell this message to the Achaean leaders—for that is the honor of old men—that they may devise another plan in their hearts, a better one, to save their ships and the Achaean army upon the hollow ships. The plan they conceived

while I was angry will not save them.
Let Phoenix sleep here beside us, so that he may sail with me tomorrow to my dear fatherland, if he wishes. I will not carry him by force.”

Odysseus returned to the council and told them the answer.

The chiefs sat in grief. Diomedes said: "Let us eat and sleep. Tomorrow we will fight. A man who trusts his own courage need not beg another's help." Phoenix remained beside Achilles, and the old horseman spoke with tears rising, for he feared the Achaean ships: "If you are set on homecoming, shining Achilles, and will not ward the destructive fire from the swift ships because anger has entered your heart, how could I remain here without you, my dear child? The old horseman Peleus sent me with you on the day he sent you from Phthia to Agamemnon, still a child who knew nothing of equal war or public speech, where distinguished men become leaders. He sent me to teach you all this: to be a speaker of words and a doer of deeds. "For that reason, dear child, I would not willingly be left behind by you, not even if a god promised to scrape old age from me and make me young again, as I was when I first fled lovely Hellas from quarrels with my father, Amyntor son of Ormenus. He was angry over his fair-haired concubine, whom he loved and dishonored my mother. She begged me by my knees to sleep with the woman, so that the old man might hate her.

I obeyed and did it. My father learned of it, cursed me terribly, and called upon the Erinyes never to let a son born from me sit upon his knees. Zeus beneath the earth and dread Persephoneia fulfilled his curses. "My heart could no longer bear to remain in my angry father's house. Friends and cousins tried to restrain me; many fat sheep, twisting-horned cattle, and shining pigs were slaughtered, and much of the old man's wine was drunk. For nine nights they kept watches around me, with fires never going out in the court and before the bedroom doors. On the tenth dark night I broke through the tightly fitted doors, jumped the courtyard wall, and fled unseen by the guards and serving women. I crossed broad Hellas and came to fertile Phthia, mother of sheep, to King Peleus. He welcomed me freely and loved me as a father loves his only, late-born son among many possessions. He made me rich and gave me a numerous people, and I ruled the Dolopes at the edge of Phthia. "I loved you from my heart, godlike Achilles, and raised you so that you would never go to a feast or eat in the halls with another before I had seated you on my knees,

cut the meat, and poured the wine.
Often you drenched the tunic on my breast, spilling wine in your painful childhood. For you I suffered much and labored much, thinking that the gods had not granted me a child of my own; I made you my son, godlike Achilles, so that you might one day ward an unseemly doom from me.
“But tame your great spirit, Achilles; you must not keep a pitiless heart.
The gods
themselves can bend, though their strength, honor, and power are greater. Human beings turn them with sacrifices, gentle vows, libations, and the savor of offerings, begging when someone has transgressed or gone astray. Prayers are daughters of great Zeus:
they are lame and wrinkled, and look sideways; yet they follow afterward, caring for ruin. Whoever respects them when they draw near is greatly helped, and they hear him when he prays. Whoever rejects them and stubbornly refuses them, they go to Zeus and ask that ruin follow him, so that, harmed, he may pay the price.
“Achilles, grant the daughters of Zeus their honor; they bend the minds of other good men as well. If Agamemnon were not bringing gifts and promising more later, but always remained fiercely angry, I would not ask you to cast off your wrath and defend the Argives, desperate though they are.

But now he gives much at once and has promised much for later, and he has sent the best men in all the Achaean army, men who are dearest to you. Do not reject their words or despise their feet. It was not wrong to be angry before. We have heard the fame of men of old who were turned by great anger, with gifts and words.
“I remember an ancient deed, and I will tell it among you all. The Curetes and the great-hearted Aetolians fought around lovely Calydon, killing one another. Artemis, golden-throned, sent evil upon them because Oineus failed to sacrifice first-fruits to her, though the other gods feasted upon hecatombs. Whether he forgot or failed to notice, he was deeply mistaken. The archer goddess, enraged, sent a wild boar with white tusks that ravaged Oineus’ orchards, throwing great trees to the ground, roots, blossoms, and fruit together.
“Meleager, Oineus’ son, killed it after gathering hunters and hounds from many cities;
it was too great to be brought down by a few mortals, and it sent many to the painful pyre. Artemis raised a loud quarrel over the boar's head and shaggy hide between the Curetes and the proud Aetolians.

While Meleager fought, the Curetes suffered and could not remain outside the walls, though they were many. But when anger entered Meleager—the anger that swells even in the breast of a thoughtful man—he lay beside his lovely wife Cleopatra, nursing the wrath caused by his mother Althaea's curses. She had prayed to Hades and dread Persephoneia for her brother's death, beating the nourishing earth
with her hands and kneeling in tears; the Erinyes heard her from Erebus,
with her
pitiless heart.
“Soon the clash and din rose around the gates as towers were struck down. The elders of the Aetolians begged Meleager and sent their best priests, promising a great gift:
in the richest plain of Calydon he might choose a beautiful fifty-ploughland estate, half planted in vines and half open for the plow. His father Oineus begged him from the threshold, shaking the fitted doors on his knees; his sisters and queenly mother begged him, and his closest companions as well. But they could not move his heart until the Curetes were already upon the chamber and burning the great city.

“Then his well-girded wife came weeping and told him all the evils that befall people when a city is taken: the men are killed, the city is burned, and strangers carry off the children and deep-girdled women. His spirit was stirred when he heard of these deeds. He rose, put on his radiant armor, and warding the evil day from the Aetolians, yielding to his own heart. Yet they did not fulfill the many beautiful gifts they had promised; he warding the evil without
them.

“Do not let your mind turn toward this, Achilles; do not let some god lead you there.

It would be worse to ward the evil only when the ships are burning. Go toward the gifts:

the Achaeans will honor you like a god. If you enter the man-killing battle without gifts, you will not have equal honor, even though you drive war away.”

Achilles answered: “Old Phoenix, father dear, you have said all this from love;

but I do not need this honor. I think I am honored by Zeus' decree, and that honor

will remain with me beside my curved ships as long as breath stays in my breast and my knees move. I tell you this: do not trouble my heart, grieving and mourning for the sake of Agamemnon. You should not love him, lest you become hateful to me while you are dear to me. It is good to care for the one who cares for me. Rule beside me as an equal and share half my honor. These men will carry the message; you remain here and sleep on a soft bed. At dawn we will consider whether to return home or stay.” He nodded silently to Patroclus, who spread a thick bed for Phoenix, so that the old man might decide whether to sail home with him. Great Ajax, son of Telamon, then spoke: “Resourceful Odysseus, son of Laertes, let us go. I do not think our mission will be completed by this road. We must report the message quickly, even though it is bad, to the Danaans who now sit waiting. Achilles has set a wild, great-hearted spirit in his breast. He is pitiless and does not turn from the love of his companions, by which we honored him above all beside the ships. A man accepts compensation for a murdered brother or son, and once he receives the price, his heart and proud spirit are restrained. But the gods have put an unending, evil temper in your breast because of a single woman. We offer you seven excellent women and many other things besides. Put a gracious spirit in yourself and respect your own roof; we are beneath it, chosen from all the Danaans, and we wish to be your dearest and most beloved companions among the Achaeans.”

Achilles, swift-footed, answered: “Ajax, son of Telamon, lord of the people, you have spoken all according to my heart. But my heart swells with anger whenever I remember how Agamemnon treated me before the Argives, as though I were some dishonored wanderer.

Go, then, and report my message. I will not concern myself with bloody war until Hector, Priam’s wise son, reaches the huts and ships of the Myrmidons, killing Argives and burning the ships. Around my hut and black ship, I think, Hector, eager for battle, will be stopped.”

So he spoke. Each man took the two-handled cup, poured a libation beside the ships, and went back; Odysseus led them. Patroclus ordered his companions and the serving women to spread a thick bed for Phoenix at once. They obeyed, laying fleeces, a rug, and a fine linen covering. There the old man lay waiting for bright Dawn.

Achilles
slept in the innermost part of the well-built shelter; beside him lay Diomedes, the beautiful daughter of Phorbas, whom he had brought from Lesbos.
Patroclus lay on the other side, and beside him lay well-girded Iphigeneia, whom Achilles had given him after capturing steep Scyros, Enyalios' city.
When the embassy reached Agamemnon's shelter, the sons of the Achaeans welcomed them with golden cups, rising one after another and asking what they had found. First Agamemnon, lord of men, asked:
"Tell me, renowned Odysseus, great glory of the Achaeans: does he wish to ward the enemy fire from the ships, or has he refused, and does anger still hold his great-hearted spirit?" The much-enduring godlike Odysseus answered: "Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnon, lord of men, he does not wish to extinguish his anger; it burns in him still more.
He rejects you and your gifts. He tells you to devise among the Argives how you may save the ships and the Achaeans. He himself threatened that, when bright Dawn appears, he will drag his well-benched ships into the sea. He advised the others to sail home,

since you will not find the end of steep Ilium: Zeus of the wide eyes has stretched his hand above it, and its people have taken courage. Ajax and both wise heralds, who followed me, can say the same.
Phoenix has lain down, as Achilles commanded,
so that he may sail with him tomorrow to his beloved fatherland, if he wishes; he will not carry him by force."
He spoke, and all were silent, astonished at the force of the answer.
For a long time the sons of the Achaeans sat in sorrow. At last Diomedes, loud in battle, said:
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnon, lord of men, you should never have begged the blameless son of Peleus with countless gifts. He is proud enough without them, and now you have driven him deeper into pride. Let us leave him, whether he goes or stays;
he will fight again whenever his heart commands and a god rouses him.
Come, let us do as I say: sleep now, having satisfied the heart with food and wine, for these give strength and courage. When fair, rose-fingered Dawn appears, quickly marshal the men and horses before the ships, urge them on, and fight yourself among the foremost."

All the kings praised the speech of horse-taming Diomedes. They poured libations and went each to his shelter, where they slept and received the gift of sleep.

Source range: Book 9. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — The embassy stands before Achilles and his lyre Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 10

First-pass working translation

The other chiefs, the best of all the Achaeans, slept beside the ships, overcome by gentle sleep. But Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, was not held by sweet sleep, for many thoughts drove through his mind. As the husband of Hera,

fair-haired queen, flashes lightning while he prepares immeasurable rain, hail,

or snow, or opens the great mouth of war, so Agamemnon groaned deeply from his heart, and his thoughts trembled within him. Whenever he looked toward the Trojan plain, he marveled at the many fires burning before Ilium, and at the sound of flutes, pipes, and the tumult of men.

Whenever he looked toward the ships and the

Achaean army, he tore great locks from his head for Zeus above and groaned from his victorious heart.

At last the best plan seemed to him to go first to Nestor, son of Neleus, and see whether together they might shape some blameless counsel that could ward disaster from all the Danaans. He rose, put on his tunic, bound his fine sandals beneath

his shining feet, wrapped himself in the red hide of a great tawny lion that fell to his heels, and took his spear.

Menelaus was seized by the same trembling; sleep

would not settle upon his eyelids, for he feared that the Argives might suffer harm, having crossed the sea to Troy for his sake and entered the bold war. He first covered his broad back with a dappled leopard skin, lifted a bronze helmet upon his head, and took a spear in his powerful hand. He went to rouse his brother, who ruled all the Argives and was honored among the people like a god.

He found Agamemnon fitting his beautiful armor beside the stern of the ship, and was welcome when he came.

Menelaus spoke first: "Why are you arming yourself like this, brother? Are you going to send one of your companions as a spy among the

Trojans? I greatly fear no one will undertake this work alone, to scout hostile

men through the immortal night, unless he has an exceptionally bold
heart."

Agamemnon answered: "We need a profitable plan, you and I, dear Menelaus, one that may rescue and save the Argives and their ships, now that Zeus' mind has turned.

He has set his heart more strongly upon Hector than before. I have never seen or heard of one man devising so many grievous deeds in a single day as Hector, dear to Zeus, has wrought against the sons of Achaeans—neither son of a goddess nor favorite of a god. He has done things that I say will long trouble the Argives;
so many evils has he planned for them. Go now, run swiftly to Ajax and Idomeneus beside the ships. I will go to noble Nestor and urge him to rise and come to the holy watch, and to give the orders.
They will obey him most readily, since his son commands among the guards, as does Meriones, Idomeneus' companion; we entrusted the watch chiefly to them.” Menelaus asked: “What do you command me to do? Should I wait here among them until you return, or run back to you after I have given them your orders?” Agamemnon answered: “Remain here, so that we do not miss one another among the many paths through the camp. Call loudly wherever you go, waking each man by his father's name and honoring them all. Do not carry yourself proudly; let us labor ourselves as well. Zeus is surely sending this heavy evil upon us.”

He sent his brother away with careful instructions and went to Nestor, shepherd of the people. He found the old man beside his hut and black ship, lying on a soft bed; near him lay his figured shield, two shining spears, and a bright, many-colored belt with which the old man armed himself whenever he led the people into man-destroying war, refusing to yield to grievous old age.
Nestor raised his head on his elbow and asked: “Who are you, walking alone through the camp and the dark night, when other mortals sleep? Are you seeking one of the watchmen, or one of your companions? Speak; do not approach me silently. What do you need?”
Agamemnon answered: “You will recognize me, Nestor, son of Neleus, great glory of the Achaeans: Agamemnon, whom Zeus has set among unending labors until breath remains in my breast and my knees move. I wander because gentle sleep does not settle upon my eyes; war and the cares of the Achaeans consume me. I dread terribly for the Danaans; my heart is not steady, I am shaken, my heart leaps from my breast, and my bright limbs tremble. If you have any plan—for sleep does not visit you either—let us go down among the guards and see that fatigue and sleep have not overcome them so that they have entirely forgotten the watch. The enemy lies close by, and we do not know whether they might even be eager to fight through the night.”

Nestor, the Gerenian horseman, replied: “Most glorious son of Atreus, lord of men, Agamemnon, Zeus the counselor will not fulfill every thought Hector now expects.
I think he will suffer still more trouble if Achilles turns his dear heart away from his bitter anger. I will follow you, and we will rouse Tydeus’ famous son, Odysseus, swift Ajax, and the brave son of Phyleus. Let someone also go call the godlike Ajax and lord Idomeneus, since their ships are farthest away. I will rebuke Menelaus, dear though he is and worthy of respect, and I will not hide that he sleeps while he has left you alone to labor.
He should have worked among all the best men, begging them, for the need has become intolerable.” Agamemnon answered: “Old man, at other times I would tell you to blame him; often he gives way and does not wish to labor, neither from cowardice nor from dullness, but watching me and awaiting my impulse. Now he woke before me and came to me first.

I sent him to call those whom you name. Let us go; we will find them before the gates among the guards, where I told them to gather.” Nestor said: “No Argive will resent or disobey him when he urges and commands.”
He dressed, bound his sandals, fastened a long double crimson cloak with its thick nap, and took a powerful spear sharpened with bronze. He went through the ships of the bronze-clad Achaeans.
First Nestor woke Odysseus, equal in counsel to Zeus. His voice quickly reached the hero’s mind, and Odysseus came out of his shelter, asking: “Why do you wander alone through the ships and the immortal night? What urgent need has come upon you?”
Nestor answered: “Do not be angry, resourceful son of Laertes. Such grief has fallen upon the Achaeans. Come with us, and let us wake another man suited to counsel, whether we must flee or fight.” Odysseus went into his shelter, slung his patterned shield over his shoulders, and followed them. They came to Diomedes, son of Tydeus, and found him outside his hut with his armor on. His companions slept around him, their shields beneath their heads and their spears planted upright in the butt, the bronze flashing far off like the lightning of father Zeus. The hero slept upon the hide of a field-ox, with a bright rug spread beneath his head.

Nestor stood beside him, nudged him with his foot, and roused and rebuked him: “Wake, son of Tydeus. Why do you waste the whole night in sleep? Do you not hear that the Trojans are camped on the rise of the plain close beside the ships, and that only a little space holds them back?”
Diomedes sprang up quickly and said: “Old man, you are relentless; you never stop working. Are there not younger sons of the Achaeans who could go among the kings and wake each one in turn? You are impossible, old man.” Nestor answered: “Yes, dear friend, you have spoken rightly. I have blameless sons, and many people, and one of them could go calling. But a great need has fallen upon the Achaeans: now all stand upon a razor’s edge, between grievous death and life.
Go and rouse swift Ajax and the son of Phyleus; you are younger, if you pity me.”

Diomedes wrapped the hide of a great tawny lion around his shoulders, took his spear, and went to rouse them. He led them to the gathered guards. They did not find the leaders of the watch asleep: all sat awake in their armor. As dogs around a sheepfold lose sleep when they hear a fierce beast moving through the hills, with a great tumult of men and dogs rising against it, so the sweet sleep had vanished from the eyes of the guards as they watched through the evil night, always turning their faces toward the plain whenever they heard the Trojans advancing.
The old man rejoiced when he saw them, encouraged them with his words, and said: “Guard the camp faithfully, dear children; let sleep seize no one, lest we become a joy to our enemies.” He crossed the trench, and the kings of the Argives who had been summoned to council followed him. Meriones and Nestor’s shining son joined them, for the kings themselves had called them to share the counsel. They crossed the dug trench and sat in a clear place where the ground showed the bodies of those who had fallen, the place from which mighty Hector had turned back, killing Argives, when night first covered the field.

There they sat and spoke among themselves. Nestor began: "Friends, is there some man who trusts his own brave spirit enough to go among the proud Trojans and seize one of the enemy stragglers, or learn some word among the Trojans—what they are planning, whether they intend to remain by the ships away from the city, or withdraw into the city now that they have defeated the Achaeans? If he learned all this and returned unharmd, he would win great fame beneath the sky among all men, and an excellent reward. Every one of the best men who command the ships would give him a black ewe, with a suckling lamb at her side; no possession would equal it, and it would always be present at feasts and banquets." All fell silent. Then Diomedes, loud in battle, spoke: "Nestor, my heart and proud spirit urge me to enter the enemy camp, since the hostile men are close.
But if some other man would accompany me, the work would be easier and more confident. When two go together, one sees before the other and finds the advantage; a solitary man, even if he has thought deeply, is slower to discover and weaker in counsel."

There they sat, and Nestor asked whether some man trusted his own brave heart enough to enter the proud Trojans' camp, seize an enemy straggler, or learn what the Trojans planned—whether they meant to remain by the ships or withdraw into the city now that they had defeated the Achaeans. If he learned everything and returned unharmd, he would win great fame beneath the sky and a fine reward:
each of the best ship-commanders would give him a black ewe with a suckling lamb, a prize that would always attend his feasts and banquets.
All were silent. Diomedes spoke:
"Nestor, my heart and proud spirit urge me to enter the enemy camp, since the hostile men are close. But if another man would come with me, the work would be warmer and more secure. When two go together, one sees first what is to be done; a solitary man, even if he has thought deeply, has a narrower mind and a thinner counsel."
Many wished to follow him: both Ajaxes, servants of Ares; Meriones; Nestor's son;
Menelaus, famous with the spear; and enduring Odysseus, whose spirit always dared to plunge into the Trojan crowd.

Agamemnon answered: "Son of Tydeus, Diomedes,
dear to my heart, choose whichever companion you wish, the best of those who have offered themselves. Do not leave the better man behind out of respect for birth, and take the worse because he is more kingly."

Diomedes answered: "If you command me to choose a companion, how could I forget godlike Odysseus? His heart and proud spirit are ready for every labor, and Pallas

Athena loves him. With him beside me we could return even from burning fire, for he understands how to discover a path."

Odysseus replied: "Do not praise or rebuke me too much; these things are already known among the Argives. Let us go: night is passing, dawn is near, the stars have advanced, more than two parts of the night are gone, and the third alone remains."

They clothed themselves in terrible armor. Thrasymedes gave Diomedes a two-edged sword, since his own had been left beside the ship, and a shield; he set upon his head a bull-hide helmet without boss or crest, called a skull-cap, which protects the heads of young men. Meriones gave Odysseus a bow, quiver, and sword, and set upon his head a helmet made of hide, strengthened inside by many straps and bristling outside with the closely set white teeth of a boar. Autolycus had once taken it from the house of Amyntor son of Ormenus and given it to Amphidamas of Cythera;

Amphidamas gave it as a guest-gift to Molus, and Molus gave it to Meriones. Now

Meriones gave it to Odysseus, and it covered his head securely.

When they had put on the dreadful armor, they set out, leaving all the best men behind. Pallas Athena sent a heron close beside their road on the right, but they could not see it through the dark; they heard only its cry. Odysseus rejoiced and prayed: "Hear me, daughter of aegis-bearing Zeus, who stand beside me in every labor and never escape my notice when I am moved. Be with me now above all, and grant that we return to the famous ships after doing a great deed that will trouble

the Trojans."

Diomedes prayed in turn: "Hear me, daughter of Zeus, unconquered Athena. Come with me as when you followed my noble father Tydeus to Thebes, when he went as messenger before the Achaeans. He left the bronze-clad Achaeans beside Asopus and carried a gentle message to the Cadmeans, but on his return he devised terrible deeds with you beside him, divine goddess, standing freely at his side. Stand with me now and guard me. I will sacrifice to you a broad-browed yearling heifer, unbroken and never brought beneath a man's yoke; I will pour gold over her horns and offer her to you."

So they prayed, and Pallas Athena heard them. They set out like two lions through the black night, through slaughter, among corpses, armor, and dark blood.
Hector did not let the bold Trojans sleep either. He summoned all the leaders and masters of the people and devised a careful plan: "Who will promise to perform this work for a great gift? His reward will be sufficient. I will give a chariot and two long-necked horses, the best beside the swift ships of the Achaeans, to the man who dares approach the ships, learn whether they are guarded as before, or whether,
defeated by our hands, the Achaeans are planning flight and do not wish to watch

through this terrible fatigue-filled night."
All fell silent. But among the Trojans was Dolon, son of the herald Eumedes, a man rich in gold and bronze, ugly in appearance but swift of foot, the only son among five sisters. He spoke to the Trojans and Hector: "Hector, my heart and proud spirit urge me to approach the swift ships and learn what is there. Raise the scepter for me and swear that you will give me the horses and decorated chariot that carry the blameless son of Peleus. I will not be a useless spy for you; I will go straight through the army until I reach Agamemnon's ship, where the best men are likely now deliberating whether to flee or fight." Hector took the scepter in his hands and swore: "Let Zeus himself, loud-thundering husband of Hera, witness that no other Trojan will mount those horses; I say you alone will have the glory of them." He swore falsely and roused Dolon.
At once Dolon slung his curved bow around his shoulders, wrapped himself in the hide of a gray wolf, set a marten-skin cap upon his head, took a sharp spear, and went from the camp toward the ships. He would not return from the ships to carry his message to

Hector.
When he had left the horses and men behind and gone some distance, godlike Odysseus
saw him approaching and said to Diomedes: "There is a man coming from the camp. I do not know whether he is a spy for our ships or a plunderer of the dead. Let us first let him pass a little way across the plain; then we can spring upon him and seize him.
If his feet outrun us, drive him from the camp toward the ships with your spear, so that he cannot escape toward the city."
They spoke and crouched beside the road among the corpses. Dolon ran past them in reckless haste. When he had gone as far as the tails of mules, which are better than oxen at dragging a well-made plow through deep fallow, the two sprang out. Hearing the noise, he stopped, thinking his companions were returning from the Trojans at Hector's command. But when they were a spear's cast or less away, he recognized hostile men, and his swift knees carried him into flight.
As two sharp-toothed dogs, trained for the hunt, chase a fawn or hare without rest through a wooded place while the creature runs before them crying, so the son of

Tydeus and city-sacking Odysseus pursued him without cease. When he was nearly about to reach the guards fleeing toward the ships, Athena put strength into Diomedes, so that no other bronze-clad Achaean might strike first and claim the glory, leaving him second. Diomedes sprang with his spear and called: "Stop, or I will reach you with my spear; you will not long escape a steep death from my hand." He threw and deliberately missed. The spear's polished point passed over Dolon's right shoulder and fixed itself in the ground. Dolon stopped, struck with terror, his teeth chattering, his skin pale with fear. The two panting men reached him and seized his hands.
Dolon cried through his tears: "Take me alive, and I will ransom myself.
At home I have bronze, gold, and much-worked iron; my father would give you an immeasurable ransom if he heard that I was alive among the Achaean ships." Resourceful Odysseus answered:
"Take courage; let death not be in your heart. Tell me plainly: why have you come alone toward the ships through the dark night, when other mortals sleep? Were you plundering the corpses, or did Hector send you to spy out everything among the hollow ships, or did your own spirit drive you?” “Hector led me here,” Dolon said, his limbs trembling. “He promised to give me the single-hoofed horses of the great son of Peleus and the chariot worked with bronze.

He ordered me to go quickly through the black night to the hostile men and learn whether the swift ships were still guarded as before, or whether the Achaeans,

overcome by terrible fatigue and defeated by our hands, were planning flight and did not wish to watch through the night.”

Odysseus smiled: “So your heart was reaching after great gifts—the horses of the warrior Aeacides? They are difficult for mortal men to master or drive, except for

Achilles, whose mother is immortal.
Now tell us plainly: where did you leave Hector, shepherd of the people? Where are his armor and horses? How are the other Trojans’ guards and beds arranged? What do they plan among themselves—will they remain here by the ships, away from the city, or withdraw into the city after defeating the

Achaeans?”

Dolon answered: “I will tell you all of this exactly. Hector is among the counselors, deliberating beside the sacred tomb of Ilus, far from the uproar. The guards you ask about are not assigned and set apart to protect the army. The Trojans whose fires are burning must keep awake and urge one another to watch. But the far-called allies sleep; they have handed the guard to the Trojans, for their children and wives are not close by.”

Odysseus asked: “How do they sleep—mixed among the horse-taming Trojans or apart?

Tell me, so that I may know.”

Dolon answered: “Toward the sea lie the Carians, Paeonians with bent bows, Leleges,

Caucones, and godlike Pelasgians.
Toward Thymbra are the Lycians, haughty Mysians, horse-fighting Phrygians, and Maeonians with their horses. But why do you question me about each one? If you intend to enter the Trojan crowd, the Thracians lie apart, newly arrived and farthest from the others. Their king is Rhesus, son of Eioneus.

I saw his horses: the fairest and largest, whiter than snow and swift as the winds.

His chariot is beautifully worked in gold and silver, and he brought golden armor,

immense and a wonder to behold—not armor for mortal men, but armor that seemed fit for immortal gods. Now take me to the swift ships, or bind me here in a pitiless bond until you return and test whether I have spoken truly.” Diomedes looked at him grimly: “Do not put flight into your heart, Dolon, though you have brought good news and fallen into our hands. If we released you now, you could come again to the swift ships to spy or fight against us. But if you lose your life under my hands, you will no longer be a trouble to the Argives.” Dolon reached toward Diomedes’ beard to beg, but Diomedes sprang and struck the middle of his neck with his sword, severing both tendons. Dolon’s head fell into the dust while he was still speaking.

Odysseus and Diomedes took from him the marten-skin cap, wolf-hide, back-bent bow, and long spear.
Odysseus lifted them high in his hand to Athena, the goddess of spoil: “Hail, goddess. We will give these first among all the immortals in Olympus; but now send us again to the horses and beds of the Thracian
men.”
He raised the spoils and placed them upon a tamarisk, marking the place with broken reeds and flowering branches, so that they would not miss it when they returned through the black night. They went onward through armor and dark blood and quickly reached the end of the Thracian men.

The Thracians slept, overcome by fatigue; their beautiful weapons lay in order beside them, three ranks deep, and each man had a pair of horses beside him. Rhesus slept in the middle, and his swift horses were tied at the outer edge of his chariot by the reins.
Odysseus saw him first and pointed him out to Diomedes: “There is the man, Diomedes,
and there are the horses Dolon told us about. Do not stand here uselessly in your armor. Loosen the horses—or kill the men, and I will attend to the horses.” Athena, bright-eyed, breathed strength into Diomedes. He struck among the sleeping men, and an ugly groan rose from those cut down; the ground reddened with blood.
As a lion leaps upon unwatched sheep or goats with evil intent, so the son of Tydeus went through the Thracians until he had killed twelve. Odysseus, standing behind him, dragged each man struck by Diomedes aside by the foot, thinking that the horses with their beautiful manes might pass easily and not grow afraid when they trampled the dead, since they were not yet used to the slaughter.

When Diomedes reached the king, he took away his sweet life as he gasped for breath; a bad dream had stood above him through the night, sent by Athena's counsel. Odysseus loosed the horses from the chariot and tied them together with the reins. He did not drive them out of the camp, fearing that, unaccustomed to the dead, they might shy.

While Odysseus was loosening the single-hoofed horses, gathering them with the reins, and driving them out of the crowd by flicking his bow because he had not thought to take the bright whip from the decorated chariot, Diomedes stood wondering what bold deed he should do next—drag away the chariot where the beautiful armor lay, or lift it high and carry it out, or take the lives of still more Thracians.

As he considered, Athena stood close beside him and spoke: "Remember the return, son of great-hearted Tydeus, to the hollow ships, lest another god awaken the Trojans and you come back in fear."

Diomedes understood the goddess' voice, quickly mounted the horses, and Odysseus struck them with his bow. They flew toward the swift ships.

Apollo, god of the silver bow, saw Athena following the son of Tydeus and, angered, plunged among the Trojan crowd and roused Hippocoon, a noble cousin of Rhesus. When he sprang from sleep and saw the deserted place where the swift horses had stood and the men dying in the harsh slaughter, he groaned and called his companion by name.

Then clamor and measureless uproar rose among the Trojans as they rushed together, marveling at the terrible deed those men had done before going to the hollow ships.

When the two reached the place where they had killed Hector's spy, Odysseus halted the swift horses. Diomedes leaped to the ground, placed the bloody spoils in Odysseus' hands, mounted again, and lashed the horses. They flew willingly toward the hollow ships, for that was dear to their hearts.

Before the words were finished, Nestor heard the thunder of swift horses and called:

"Friends, leaders and masters of the Argives, shall I tell a falsehood or speak the truth? My ears are struck by the pounding of swift-footed horses. If only Odysseus and mighty Diomedes were driving horses from the Trojans in this way! Yet I fear terribly that the best of the Argives have suffered beneath the Trojan uproar.”

Before he could finish, the men themselves arrived. They climbed down from the horses, and the chiefs greeted them with right hands and gentle words.
Nestor first asked renowned Odysseus, great glory of the Achaeans: “Tell me how you took these horses. Did you enter the Trojan crowd and take them, or did some god meet you and give them to you? They shine like rays of the sun. I mingle with the Trojans often, though I am an old warrior and do not remain idle beside the ships, but I have never seen or imagined horses like these. I think a god gave them to you on meeting you, for Zeus the cloud-gatherer loves you both, and so does Athena, daughter of aegis-bearing Zeus.” Resourceful Odysseus answered: “A god who wished it could easily give even better horses, old man, for these are far superior. These are Thracian horses newly arrived;
the good Diomedes killed their king and twelve of his best companions.
The thirteenth was the spy near the ships, the man whom Hector and the other splendid Trojans sent to scout our army.”

With that he drove the single-hoofed horses across the trench, laughing aloud, and the other rejoicing Achaeans followed. When they reached Diomedes’ well-built hut, they tied the horses with carefully cut straps at the manger where Diomedes’ swift horses stood eating tender wheat.
Odysseus placed Dolon’s bloody spoils in the stern of the ship, intending to prepare them as a sacred offering for Athena.
They stepped into the sea and washed the sweat from their legs, shoulders, and thighs. When the sea’s wave had cleansed their heavy sweat and cooled their hearts, they entered the polished bathing tubs, washed, and anointed themselves richly with oil.
Then they sat down to supper, and from a full mixing bowl they poured sweet wine as a libation to Athena.

Source range: Book 10. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Diomedes and Odysseus confront Dolon beneath the night sky

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK II

First-pass working translation

Dawn rose from the bed of noble Tithonus, Bringing light to immortals and to mortals.
But Zeus sent Strife to the swift ships of the Achaeans, A sign of war holding its violence in both hands.
She stood upon Odysseus' great
black ship,
Midway between the stations of Ajax, son of Telamon, And Achilles, whose ships lay at the two ends, Trusting in their courage and their
strength.
There she cried aloud, a great and terrible cry,
And put unwearied battle-strength into Each Achaean heart. War grew sweeter to them Than sailing home in hollow ships toward
Their beloved fatherland.
Agamemnon shouted, and ordered the Argives to arm.
He clothed his body in the bright bronze. First He fastened greaves, beautiful, with silver ankle-pieces, Around his shins; then put the breastplate on That Cinyras had given him, a guest-gift.

Cinyras, hearing in Cyprus that the
Achaeans
Would sail to Troy, had sent it to please the king.
Ten dark-blue bands ran around it, twelve of gold,
And twenty of tin; three dark-blue serpents rose Toward the neck on either side, like rainbows
The son of Cronus sets within a cloud,
A sign to mortal men.
Around his shoulders he hung a sword with golden nails, Its silver scabbard held by golden straps. He took A great shield, elaborate and terrible: ten bronze Rings circled it, twenty white bosses of tin,
And at its center one dark-blue boss.
Upon it Was the grim-eyed Gorgon; around her Deimos walked And Phobos. A silver strap held the shield,
And a dark-blue serpent twisted along it, Three heads arising from a single neck.
He set upon his head a four-bossed helmet,
Horse-haired, with a dreadful crest, and took two spears, Powerful, sharpened with bronze.
The bronze flashed Toward heaven, while Athena and Hera thundered

In honor of the king of golden Mycenae.
Each man instructed his charioteer to hold the horses In order by the trench. The foot soldiers, armed, Surged forward; an unquenchable cry rose before morning.
Chariots reached the trench first; horsemen followed,
A little way behind. From above, Zeus sent A bloody mist of dew from the clear air, Because many strong heads were destined for Hades.
On the other side the Trojans gathered round
Great Hector, blameless Polydamas, and Aeneas, Honored among them like a god, with the three sons Of Antenor—Polybus, shining
Agenor,
And Acamas, like immortals. Hector bore
A shield that covered him on every side;
At times he shone among the foremost like a baleful star That breaks from cloud, then sinks again in shadow.
So he appeared in front and then behind,
Giving his orders; all his bronze flashed like
The lightning of aegis-bearing Zeus.
Trojans and Achaeans rushed on one
another,

Like reapers driving rows against each other
Through the rich field of a wealthy man, cutting Wheat or barley, while the dense handfuls fall.
They slaughtered, and neither side remembered Ruinous flight. The battle held them equal;
The fighters rushed like wolves.
Strife alone rejoiced.
None of the other gods came among them, but sat
At ease in their own halls on Mount Olympus.
All blamed dark-clouded Cronus' son, because He meant to give the Trojans glory.
But the Father
Did not care; he sat apart, rejoicing in his power, Watching Troy and the Achaean ships, the flash
Of bronze, the killing and the killed.
While morning lasted and the sacred day grew strong, Missiles struck both sides, and men fell. But when A woodcutter has prepared his meal
among
The mountain valleys, his hands tired from cutting Tall trees, and hunger has come upon him, then
The Danaans, calling rank by rank, broke
The battalions. Agamemnon sprang
first.

He killed Bienor, shepherd of the people, who leapt From his horses and stood against him; straight Through his forehead drove the spear, and heavy bronze Passed through the bone and scattered all his brains.
Then he struck Oileus, the horse-driver,
As he came on, and left both men
there,
Their shining breastplates stripped.
Then he came upon Isus and Antiphus, two sons
Of Priam, borne together in a single car—
One bastard-born, the other from the marriage bed.
Achilles, once upon the slopes of Ida, Had found them shepherding, and bound them fast With pliant willow; then he let them go, Accepting ransom. Now the son of Atreus
Struck Isus through the breast; beside the ear
He drove the sword into Antiphus and cast Them from the horses. Eagerly he stripped Their shining armor, knowing it from the day When swift Achilles led them down from Ida.
As when a lion in the forest finds The hidden fawns of a swift deer, and bears

The tender young away, while far off runs
The mother, trembling through the shadowed trees, So none could save the sons of Troy
that day;
They fled before the Argives, each from each.
Then Agamemnon seized Pisander, strong Hippolochus, the sons of Antimachus,
Who, bribed with Alexander's shining gold,
Had barred the return of fair-haired
Menelaus
With Helen. Both were driven in one chariot;
Their horses fled, and from the reins they fell,
Confounded, on their knees before the king.
"Take us alive, O son of Atreus; take Our ransom. In Antimachus's house lie stores
Of bronze and gold and iron wrought with care.
Our father, hearing that we still drew breath Among the ships, would pay an endless price."
But Agamemnon answered, hard as
bronze:
"If you are sons of that Antimachus Who once in Troy's assembly urged the death
Of Menelaus and the godlike son Of Laertes, when they came as messengers,

Then pay your father's shame." He struck Pisander Through the chest and hurled him from the car.
Hippolochus leapt down; the sword took hands
And neck, and sent his body rolling through
The crowd, as down a hillside rolls a stone.
Then, with the bronze-clad Danaans, he rushed Wherever battle thickened. Footmen slew
The footmen fleeing; horsemen struck the horsemen; Dust climbed beneath the hammering hooves, and bronze Fed on the ranks, while Agamemnon pressed Behind them, shouting, driving on the Argives.
As when a wind-fed fire runs through a wood Grown dry beneath the summer sun, and shrubs Fall root and branch before the leaping flame,
So Trojan heads fell underneath the
king;
And many high-necked horses dragged their cars Unmanned through battle, grieving for the hands That once had held them. There the dead lay strewn, More welcome to the vultures than their wives.
But Zeus drew Hector from the spears, the dust,

The slaughter and the blood.
Agamemnon still Pressed after, shouting orders to the
ranks.
They crossed the plain beside the ancient mound
Of Ilus, Dardanus's son, and near The fig tree, making for the city walls.
Hector came crying, both his hands blood-stained.
At last, beneath the Skaian Gates,
beside
The beech, the Trojans wheeled and formed their line;
Yet many fled across the middle
plain.
As cattle scatter when a lion springs Upon them in the darkness, seizes one
By the neck, and first breaks it with his teeth,
Then tears the blood and entrails from its body, So Agamemnon hunted those who lagged,
And still he killed them as the Trojans fled.
When now the host drew near the steep city wall, Zeus, father of the gods and men, had come Down from the sky and sat upon the heights
Of Ida, holding thunder in his hand.
He sent gold-winged Iris to summon
Hector:
"Swift Iris, go; deliver this to Hector: While he beholds the shepherd
Agamemnon

Raging among the foremost, cutting
down
The ranks of men, let him withdraw and bid
The rest stand fast within the hard-fought battle.
But when the king is struck by spear or arrow
And leaps among his horses, I will give Hector the strength to kill until he reaches
The well-benched ships, until the sun goes down
And holy darkness gathers over all.” Wind-footed Iris obeyed and came to Troy.
She found the son of Priam among the cars
And horses joined together, and spoke near him: “Hector, son of Priam, equal in counsel
To Zeus, your father sends this word: while still You see the son of Atreus raging forth
And cutting men, give ground before him; order
The army’s rest to meet the enemy’s shock.
But when spear or arrow strikes him, and he leaps Into his horses, Zeus will give you power
To kill until you reach the ships, until
The sun goes down and holy darkness comes.”

Hector sprang from his chariot, shook his spears,
And passed through all the host, awakening
The hateful battle. Ranks turned face to face;
The Argives closed their own. The lines were set,
And Agamemnon leapt before them
all,
Eager to fight in the foremost place.
Tell me now, Muses, who inhabit
Olympus,
Who first came forth against the son of Atreus, Trojan or famous ally. Iphidamas, The noble son of Antenor, first stood
there.
In fertile Thrace, the mother of sheep, he grew;
Cisseus, his mother’s father, raised him young,
Then kept him in his house when manhood came,
And gave to him his daughter. From her chamber
The bridegroom came with honor, bringing twelve Curved ships; he left them moored at Perkote,
And walked to Ilium. There he met the king.
Their spears flew wide. Iphidamas struck below
The breastplate’s belt and leaned his whole weight on it;
The spear could not pass through the many-colored Belt, but turned back like lead against bright silver.

Agamemnon seized it in his broad
hand,
And tugged, a lion's strength, until it broke
From Iphidamas. Then with the sword he struck His neck and loosed his limbs. Far from his bride He fell into the bronze sleep, without joy Of marriage, though he had promised for her sake A hundred cattle first, then thousand goats
And sheep to fill her father's house.
The son of Atreus stripped his armor clean And bore it through the Achaean throng. But Coon, The eldest son of Antenor, saw his brother fall;
Grief darkened both his eyes.
Unseen, he came Beside the king and struck his arm below
The elbow; the spear's point passed through. The lord Of men shuddered, yet did not leave
the fight.
He rushed at Coon with spear aloft, while Coon Dragged by the foot Iphidamas, calling out
To all the strongest. As he drew the body
Beneath his bossed shield, Agamemnon drove The bronze into him, loosed his knees, and stood

Above him, cutting off his head. So both
The sons of Antenor fulfilled their fate
Beneath the hand of Atreus and went
down
Into the house of Hades.
Still Agamemnon moved among the
ranks
With spear and sword and stones, while warm blood rose From his wound. When the wound grew dry and blood No longer flowed, a sharper pain came on—
As when the daughters of harsh Hera, birth's Relentless powers, send cutting pangs through one In labor. So the pain entered the king.
He leapt into his chariot and ordered
his Driver to bear him to the hollow
ships;
His heart was troubled. Then he called aloud:
"Friends, leaders, masters of the Argives, now Defend the seafaring ships against this war.
Zeus the counselor has not allowed
me
To fight the Trojans through the whole long day."
The driver lashed the long-maned horses on;
They flew toward the ships, foam upon their chests,

Dust rising underneath them, bearing off
The king, exhausted by the work of
war.
When Hector saw Agamemnon leave, he called To Trojans, Lycians, Dardanians,
men
Who fight at close range: "Be men, my friends,
Remember your warlike strength.
The best has gone;
The son of Cronus grants me glory
now.
Drive your one-hoofed horses straight against The strong Danaans, and win greater fame."
He roused each heart, then fell upon the Greeks
As a hunter slips the white-toothed dogs
Against a wild boar or a mountain lion.
Like murderous Ares, Priam's son drove on The great-hearted Trojans. He himself moved first,
And struck the battle like a sudden wind
That leaps upon the violet sea and stirs it.
Then Hector cut down the Danaans'
leaders,
And after them the multitude, as when
The West Wind drives the South before a storm, Rolling a mighty wave and scattering foam

Beneath the wandering blast. The people's heads Fell under Hector; helplessness and ruin
Would have swept through them, driving them to the ships, Had not Odysseus called to Diomedes:
"Son of Tydeus, what has become of
us?
Have we forgotten all our warlike
courage?
Come, dear companion, stand beside me here.
It will be shame if Hector takes the
ships." Diomedes answered: "I will stay and endure;
Yet brief will be our joy, for Zeus, the gatherer
Of clouds, desires to strengthen Troy, not us."
He struck Thymbraeus from his horses through The left breast; godlike Molion fell Beneath Odysseus. Leaving both
behind,
They passed through all the crowd, rejoicing
As two wild boars that turn upon the hounds.
Trojans died before them; and the Greeks,
Who had fled, drew breath from Hector's hands.
They seized a chariot and the two best sons
Of Merops of Percote. Their father knew

The arts of prophecy and had forbidden His sons to enter man-destroying
war;
But they would not obey. The black fates led them.
Diomedes, famous with the spear, stripped Them of their lives and splendid armor; then Odysseus killed Hippodamus and strong Hypeirochus. From Ida Cronus's son Watched, stretching battle evenly; both sides Struck down their enemies, neither yielding.
The son of Tydeus struck Agastrophus,
The Paeonian, in the hip. His horses stood Too far away; his spirit had gone astray,
And while his driver held them off, he walked Among the foremost and surrendered life.
Hector saw him through the ranks and sprang Against them, shouting, with the Trojans after.
Diomedes shuddered when he saw him come,
And called to his companion: "This great Hector Rolls ruin toward us. Let us stand and turn him."
He cast his long-shadowed spear and
struck

The crown of Hector's helmet.
Bronze glanced off
The metal, and did not touch his lovely flesh;
Apollo's triple-layered helmet held.
Hector sprang back, fell upon his knees, and leaned Upon his broad hand; blackness covered him.
While Diomedes ran through the foremost ranks
To take his spear, Hector recovered breath, Leapt to his chariot, drove into the crowd,
And for that moment escaped the black death.
Diomedes shouted after him: "Dog,
again
You have escaped death. Evil came close,
But Phoebus saved you, the god you'll pray to When once you enter where the spears resound.
I will destroy you later, if some god Will stand beside me. Now I'll follow those Whom I can reach." Then he stripped the life
From that renowned Paeonian.
Alexander, Helen's fair-haired husband,
Stretched his bow against the shepherd Diomedes, Leaning beside the pillar of the ancient Tomb of Dardanian Ilus. While the
son

Of Tydeus stripped the breastplate, shield, and helm From Agastrophus, Paris drew the bow
And shot. The arrow did not leave his hand
In vain: it struck the instep of the right Foot and stood fixed in the earth.
Then Paris sprang
From hiding and laughed softly: “You are hit; my arrow has not flown in vain.
Would that it had struck your belly and taken Your life! Troy then would breathe again, as goats Bleat before a lion when they see him
come.”
Unshaken, Diomedes answered: “Archer, Foul boaster, watcher of girls—if you dared
To meet me face to face in bronze, your bow
And thick arrows could not protect you. You have Scratched my foot and boast as if you’d achieved Some great deed; I care no more than if a woman Or foolish child had struck me. A coward’s shaft Is dull. But even the smallest arrow I Send makes a man lie dead: his wife will tear Both cheeks, his children stand as orphans, and he Will redden earth while birds gather more thickly

Around him than women at a funeral.”
As he spoke, renowned Odysseus came near And stood before him. Diomedes sat behind
His shield, pulled the swift arrow from his foot,
And grievous pain ran burning through his flesh.
He leapt into his chariot and ordered The driver toward the hollow ships; his heart
Was troubled.
Odysseus stood alone with spear in
hand;
None of the Argives stayed beside him. Fear Had seized them. Grieving, he spoke to his proud heart: “What shall I do? It is a bitter thing To flee in fear of numbers; worse to be Taken alone. Cronus’s son has driven The Danaans away. Yet why does my
heart Reason like this? I know the coward leaves
The battle; whoever is best in war Must stand his ground, whether he has struck Or has himself been struck.” While he considered, Trojan ranks closed round
And hemmed him in, bringing disaster to Their own midst. As strong young hounds surround
A wild boar from the forest, sharpening

Its white tusk between its curved jaws, while he Stands fast despite their danger, so
the Trojans Rushed around Odysseus, dear to Zeus.
He struck Deïopites above the
shoulder,
Killed Thoön and Ennomus; when Chersidamas
Sprang from his horses, Odysseus struck him low Beneath the bossed shield, beneath the navel.
He fell in dust and clutched the
earth.
Odysseus left them and struck Charops, son Of Hippasus, and Socus's own brother.
Socus, a man like a god, came to guard him,
And stood close by:
"Much-praised Odysseus, insatiable For toil and trickery, today you'll boast
Of killing both the sons of Hippasus And bearing off their armor; or today
Your spirit leaves you, struck beneath my spear."
He struck Odysseus' shield. The mighty spear Passed through the shining shield and breastplate bright, And tore the flesh from his side—but Pallas Athena
Would not permit it to reach his entrails.

Odysseus knew the wound was not yet mortal.
He stepped back and spoke: "Poor man, your steep Death has already found you. You have stopped
My fighting, but today black fate is
yours.
Struck by my spear, you'll give me glory here
And give your soul to Hades." Socus turned
And fled; but as he showed his back, Odysseus
Planted the spear between his shoulders. Bronze Came through his chest, and down he fell with a crash.
Odysseus cried in triumph: "Socus,
son
Of Hippasus, death's end has reached you; you Have not escaped it. Neither father nor Your queenly mother will close your eyes in death;
The raw-eating birds will drag you, spreading wide Their wings around you. But if I should die,
The noble Achaeans will give me burial."
He pulled the heavy spear from flesh and shield;
Blood rushed out from the wound and troubled him.
When the great-hearted Trojans saw his blood, They rushed upon him shouting. He drew back

And called his comrades. Three times he cried aloud, As loudly as a man's head can contain;
Three times Menelaus, dear to Ares, heard.
He quickly called to Ajax, Telamon's
son:
"Godlike Ajax, lord of men, the cry Of steadfast Odysseus reaches me, Like one surrounded by the Trojans, alone.
Come through the crowd; it is our task to guard him.
I fear that, isolated there, this excellent
Man will be harmed, and all the Danaans grieve."
He led the way; and Ajax, equal to
the gods,
Followed. They found Odysseus surrounded
By Trojans, as red wolves surround a stag With antlers wounded. While the warm blood and strength Remain, the stag escapes; but when the arrow Overcomes him, flesh-eating wolves tear him Apart in shadowed hills. A god had driven
The wolves upon him; yet they scattered when Ajax came near, and he stood over his friend
As a lion stands above its cubs.
Many strong Trojans followed; Ajax came,

Bearing a shield as broad and tall as a tower.
He stood beside him, and the Trojans scattered.
Menelaus, dear to Ares, led Odysseus By the hand out of the crowd, until the driver Drove near the horses. Ajax sprang among
The Trojans and struck Doryclus, bastard son
Of Priam, then Pandocus, Lysander, Pyrus,
And Pylarte. As a swollen river rushes Down from the mountains after Zeus's rain, Carrying dry oaks and pines into the sea,
And casting driftwood in heaps upon
the shore,
So shining Ajax drove them over the
plain,
Cutting down horses and men.
Nor had Hector yet heard of this, for he Was fighting on the left beside the banks Of Scamander, where the heads of men fell thick,
And round old Nestor and Idomeneus
The battle's cry rose without end.
With spear
And chariot Hector mingled in the
fight,
And broke the ranks of young men, till the Greeks Had yielded ground; but Alexander, husband

Of fair-haired Helen, checked
Machaon,
The shepherd of the people, with an arrow Three-pointed, striking through his right shoulder.
Then all the Achaeans, drawing breath in fear,
Were troubled lest the battle turn, and they Should lose the healer whom they loved.
Idomeneus called aloud to Nestor: “Come, son of Neleus, glory of the Greeks;
Mount now your chariot, and let Machaon
Climb up beside you. Drive your single-hoofed Horses with all their speed toward the hollow ships.
A healer is a man of worth to many:
He cuts the arrows out, and lays on
them
The quiet medicines that soothe the pain.”
Then Nestor climbed the chariot, and Machaon,
The blameless son of Asclepius,
mounted.
He touched the horses with the shining lash;
And willingly they flew toward the
ships,
For there they loved to be.
But Cebriones, who stood beside the
son
Of Priam, saw the Trojan ranks confused,

And spoke: “We fight the Danaans at the edge
Of this hard battle, while the other
Trojans
And all their horses mingle in the crowd.
Telamonian Ajax drives them back; I know him well: his broad shield covers him.
Let us drive there, where horsemen and the men On foot, with hateful strife, destroy
each other,
And where the shouting cannot be restrained.”
He struck the long-maned horses with the lash.
They bore the chariot through the Greeks and Trojans, Over the dead, over the shields; the axle
And rims were splashed with blood from hooves and wheels.
Hector desired to enter that dense human Wave and break it, yet feared the great Ajax.
Then Zeus, the father, sent a sudden fear
Upon the son of Telamon. Amazed, He threw his sevenfold shield behind him, turned And looked about him, shifting knee by knee, Like some wild beast that leaves the fold at dawn.
As shepherds and their dogs drive off a tawny Lion, and through the night deny it flesh,

While it moves forward still, yet gains no ground,
For spears of fire spring round it; so
Ajax,
His heart unwilling, drew away, afraid
For the Achaean ships.
As when a patient ass beside a field Breaks through the boys, though many sticks are broken Upon its back, and though they beat it hard,
Yet drive it forth at last only when it has Eaten its fill; so Trojans and their allies Kept thrusting at the shield of mighty Ajax.
At times remembering all his battle-strength, He turned and checked the horse-taming Trojans; Then turned again and fled. Yet all the while He kept them from the ships, and stood between The Greeks and Troy. The spears of eager hands Stuck in the shield, some in its face; and some,
Before they touched his flesh, fell into earth.
Eurypylus, the glorious son of Euaemon,
Saw Ajax pressed by that unceasing storm.
He stood beside him and cast forth
his spear,
And struck Apisaon beneath the liver.

His knees gave way; Eurypylus sprang upon him
And stripped the armor from his shoulders. Then Alexander saw him bending over the slain,
And drew his bow; the arrow struck the thigh
Of Eurypylus, and broke within the flesh.
His leg grew heavy. He withdrew
among His comrades, fleeing death, and
called aloud:
“Friends, princes and commanders of
the Greeks, Turn, stand against this evil day, and save Great Ajax, crushed beneath the flight of arrows.
I do not think he will escape this
battle.
Stand firmly round him!” He spoke, though wounded; and the men drew close,
Their shields together, lifted up their spears.
Ajax came toward them, turning back his face
To see his comrades. The two armies fought
Like a fire burning through a field.
Meanwhile old Nestor’s horses, sweating, bore Machaon from the battle.
Swift-footed Achilles, Standing upon the stern of his great ship,
Saw them and watched the terrible exchange,

The strife of men, the tears. At once he called To his companion, Patroclus; and his voice
Was heard beside the ship. Patroclus
came From the shelter like the god of war—then first
The beginning of his evil came upon
him.
“Why call me, noble Achilles?” he asked.
“What service do you need of me?” Achilles answered: “Dear Menoetius’
son,
Beloved of my heart, I think the Greeks
Will soon stand round my knees and beg for aid;
So great a need has fallen on them
now.
Go, dear Patroclus, ask old Nestor whom
He carries wounded from the field.
From behind
The man appeared like Machaon to
me,
The son of Asclepius; but I could not See his face, for the horses swept between us.”
He spoke, and Patroclus obeyed his friend,
Running beside the huts and hollow
ships.
Then Nestor and Machaon, from the
chariot,
Stepped down upon the earth beside
the sea,
And wiped the sweat from off their tunics, while

The sea-wind cooled them. In the shelter, then,
Hecamede of the lovely braided hair,
The daughter of Arsinoüs, whom
Achilles
Had taken from Tenedos, and the Greeks
Had given to old Nestor for his excellence,
Set forth a polished table, dark of foot.
Upon it stood a cup of bronze, four-eared,
With golden studs, and doves of gold
beside
Each handle; and she mingled Pramnian wine With cheese of goat, scraped by the bronze, and meal
Of shining barley, and bade them drink.
Then Patroclus came near. The old man rose
And welcomed him; but he refused
the seat.
“No time for sitting,” he replied, “is here.
Tell me whom you have brought, struck down from battle.” Already, looking closely, he had seen Machaon, son of that great healer, and Would bear the tidings to Achilles’ tent.
And Nestor answered: “Why does Peleus’ son,
Though he can see the grief of all the host,
Not understand the grief that fills our ranks?

The chiefs are wounded: Diomedes lies Apart, and the spear wounded
Odysseus;
Agamemnon also suffers, and Eurypylus is stricken in the thigh.
The best of us lie helpless by the
ships.
Will Achilles wait until the black ships burn,
And all the Argives perish at the sea?" Then Nestor told the strength of former days, When he had fought the Epeans for their debt.
He slew Itymoneus, and took their teams, Fifty dark chariots, and from each two men;
The sons of Actor, famous horsemen
both,
The Moliones, he had nearly slain, Had not Poseidon hidden them in mist.
He told how from Pylos they drove
away
The cattle, sheep, and swine, and mares of war; How through the night they marched, and how Athena Had called him to the battle; how his father,
Old Neleus, hid his horses, thinking
him Unpracticed in the handling of a team;
How by the Minyeian river they Made offering to Zeus, Alpheius, lord

Of silver streams, Poseidon of the deep,
And bright-eyed Pallas; how the Epeans fell.
There Mulius, son-in-law of Augeias, And husband of Agamede, fell—she knew
The medicines that the nourishing earth brings forth—And Nestor seized his chariot, and took fifty More teams. The sons of Actor escaped alone, When mist from their sea-father hid them there.
"If youth and strength were mine again," he said,
"Then Achilles would win a glory greater Than any valor of my former time.
Yet tell him what your father charged you, when You left the house of Menoetius. He said: 'Achilles is the greater, by his birth And strength; but you are older.
Speak wise words Before him, and advise him. If he still Withholds himself, obeying prophecy Or his dear mother's warning, go forth armed With all the Myrmidons. Put on his arms,
And let the Trojans think Achilles comes.
So might the Argives draw a little breath,
Though only for a moment, from the war.'"

He ceased; and Patroclus ran beside
the ships, Toward where Achilles waited. But Eurypylus,
The son of Euaemon, limped from
battle,
An arrow fast within his thigh. The sweat Ran down his shoulders and his head, and dark Blood streamed from that grievous wound; his mind, Though shaken, still remained steadfast. He saw Patroclus and cried out: "Save me, my friend!
Lead me within your hut; draw forth the shaft
That pierces me, and wash away the blood
With warm water. Then sprinkle gentle herbs,
The medicines, men say, that Achilles learned From Chiron, justest of the Centaurs. Our Physicians, Podalirius and Machaon, Are wounded or are needed elsewhere; and I Have held my ground until you
came."
Then pity seized Patroclus. "I cannot leave
A man in such distress," he answered
him,
"For Nestor sent me to the son of Peleus."
He led him to the hut. A servant spread

The hides; Patroclus stretched the wounded thigh,
And with his knife cut out the bitter arrow.
He washed the black blood with warm water, then Ground down a bitter root and rubbed it in.
The wound grew dry; the dark blood ceased to flow;
Yet still the anguish held Eurypylus.

Source range: Book 11. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Patroclus tends Eurypylus and carries the crisis toward Achilles

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's Blake-informed visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 12

First-pass working translation

While Patroclus within his shelter cared For wounded Eurypylus, the Argives fought
With Troy in close confusion; yet the trench
And wall above it could no longer hold.
The wall was broad, and built to guard the ships,
With a deep trench driven round it.
Not with rites
And hecatombs that please the deathless gods Had mortal hands laid its foundations there;
And therefore it was never made to stand.
So long as Hector lived, while still
Achilles
Nursed his anger, and Priam's city Remained unbroken, so long that great work Endured. But when the bravest Trojans fell,
And many Argives too, and Priam's town Was taken in the tenth returning year,
And all the Greeks sailed homeward, then Poseidon
And Apollo would devise its ruin.
They
Would turn the rivers on it: Rhesus, clear Heptaporus, Caresus, Rhodius,

Grenicus, Aesepus, sacred Scamander,
And Simoeis, where so many shields And helmets sank, and races born of
gods.
Apollo would turn all their mouths against
The wall, and drive their waters nine full days;
And Zeus would rain continually,
until
The sea-born work grew smooth.
Earth-Shaking Lord Poseidon, holding his trident, would lead on,
And send the stones and timbers of its base Away upon the waves. Then on the shore Beside the loud Hellespont he would level it, Cover the beach with sand, and turn the streams
Back to the channels where they ran before.
Such things the gods would accomplish afterward;
But now the battle burned around the wall,
And towers rang beneath the striking spears.
The Argives, scourged by Zeus, were penned beside
The hollow ships, and feared the strength of Hector.
He moved before them like a whirlwind; as A boar or lion turns and tests the dogs

And men who stand in ranks, while spears fly thick, Yet does not tremble or withdraw, although
His courage is his death; wherever he Rushes, the close ranks open—so did
Hector
Urge his companions to cross over.
But
His horses snorted at the trench, and
stood Upon its edge. It was too broad and steep To leap or enter, and the stakes stood thick Above its banks, a fence against the foe.
No chariot could pass; the footmen longed
To find a way.
Then bold Polydamas stood near and
spoke:
“Hector, and you, commanders of the
Trojans
And allies, we drive our eager horses blind
Into the trench, though stakes stand there, and make The passage hard. The way is narrow;
there
We cannot fight on horseback, and I fear
Our men will be struck down. If Zeus, who now Has evil thoughts for us, will aid the
Trojans,
Then I would gladly see the Argives die Here, nameless, far from Argos. But if they Should drive us back, and cast us in the trench,

No messenger, I think, would reach the town Again, once they had closed their ranks around us.
“Come, let us follow counsel. Let attendants Hold fast the horses here beside the trench;
We, clothed in bronze, will follow Hector on foot, Together. If destruction has indeed Been fastened on the Greeks, they will not stand.”
So Polydamas spoke, and Hector welcomed
The harmless counsel. From his
chariot
He leapt in armor; all the others too Left their swift horses. Each man charged his driver
To keep the teams in order by the trench.
Then they were ranged in five assembled bands.
With Hector and Polydamas went
the first,
The largest and the best, most eager to break
The wall and fight beside the ships;
with them Went Cebriones. Paris led the next, With Alcathous and Agenor.
Helenus
And godlike Deiphobus, Priam’s sons, Led the third band, and Asius, son of Hyrtacus.
Aeneas, splendid son of Anchises, led

The fourth, with both the sons of Antenor, Archelochus and Acamas, skilled in
war.
Sarpedon led the famous allies, and chose Beside him Glaucus and Asteropeon, Whom, after himself, he judged the best.
All others followed Polydamas's word;
But Asius, lord of men, would not leave His horses and attendant. Fool, he drove Toward the ships, though never would he flee
The evil death that waited there, nor turn
To windy Ilium in pride again.
Idomeneus, Deucalion's son, would meet him.
Asius came upon the left of all the
ships,
Where Greeks returned from battle with their cars.
The gates stood open, and the long bar was not Drawn against the fugitives; two Lapiths stood Before them, Polypoetes, son of him Who once was Pirithous, and Leonteus,
Like murderous Ares among mortal
men.
They stood before the lofty gates like oaks Upon a mountain, whose deep roots hold fast

Against the rain and wind. Trusting their hands, They waited without fear. The Trojans came With shields of ox-hide, raising one great cry,
And gathered round their leaders.
Within,
The Greeks called out to one another, "Save The ships!" But when they saw the assault draw near,
The two sprang forth like boars within the hills,
That wait the hunters and their dogs, then turn
And break the thicket, striking sideways, till
A man brings one beneath the spear.
The bronze rang on the chests of men who met;
From tower to tower the rough stones fell, to guard The wall, the huts, the ships. They fell like snow When violent wind shakes dark clouds and pours Them thickly over earth. From either hand
The weapons streamed; the hollow shields and helmets Cried beneath blows.
Then Asius struck his thigh and groaned aloud:
"O Father Zeus, you too are wholly false!
I thought the Greeks could never stand before Our strength, when no one could restrain our hands."

Yet still the two stood firm, like wasps or bees Whose house is by a rugged road; they will not Leave their hollow dwelling, but defend their young And drive the hunters from it. So they stayed Before the gates, until they killed, or fell.
Nor did the mind of Zeus bend to the words Of Asius; for his heart desired the glory
Of Hector.
Elsewhere the battle rose at every gate;
Hard would it be for me, though like a god,
To tell the deeds of all. A storm of stones
Was everywhere; and under force the Greeks Defended the ships. The gods who stood beside
The Danaans were troubled, and the Lapiths Came into battle. There Polypoetes struck Damasus through his bronze-cheeked helmet; spear
And bone gave way. Then Pylon and Ormenus
He stripped. Leonteus, branch of Ares, struck Hippomachus beneath the belt; then drew
His sword and, leaping through the crowd, struck down Antiphates. After him fell Menon, Iamenus, and Orestes, one by one.

While they stripped the armor from the fallen,
The first and greatest companies stood still,
Uncertain by the trench, though eager to Break through the wall and set the ships aflame.
Then from the left an eagle crossed the sky,
High in the air, and in his crooked claws
He carried a great serpent, red and living.
The snake, though held, had not forgotten war:
It twisted backward, struck the bird
beneath
The breast beside the throat. The eagle writhed Against the pain, and let the serpent fall
Among the ranks; then, crying, flew
away
Upon the breath of wind.
The Trojans shuddered at the gleaming snake,
The sign of Zeus who bears the aegis.
Then
Polydamas stood close to Hector:
“You Rebuke me in the assembly when I speak What seems the better course; you say a common Man must not pass the council’s bounds. But now
I say: let us not fight beside the ships.

This sign has come to those who wished to cross.
The eagle flew upon the left and held The people back; he carried that great snake Alive, but could not take it to his home
And feed it to his children. So, although
We break the wall and gates by force, we shall Not all return along the road we
came;
Many will lie beside the ships. If one Among us standing here declared the sign, No army would resist him. To my mind
The meaning is plain: we shall force
the wall,
But shall not all come home.” Then Hector, helmet-bright, looked darkly at him:
“Your words no longer please me, Polydamas.
You know to contrive a better speech
than this;
But if you speak it in earnest, then
the gods
Have taken reason from you. Would you have me Forget the will of Zeus, who thunder speaks,
The will he promised me and sealed with a nod?
You bid me heed the long-winged birds; I care Not whether they fly toward the dawn and sun,

Or toward the misty darkness on the left.
Let us obey the purpose of great
Zeus,
Who rules the mortal and immortal kind.
“One omen is the best: to fight for home.
Why fear the battle and the work of
death?
Though all the rest should fall beside
the ships,
You have no fear of being killed;
your heart
Is neither warlike nor steadfast. But if you Hold back from battle, or by words turn one Man from the fight, then underneath my spear
You shall at once lose all the breath of life.”
So speaking, he led on; and all behind Followed with a clamor. Zeus, who loves the Thunder, raised from Ida a storm of wind
That drove the dust straight toward
the ships,
And clouded all the Achaeans’ minds, while glory Was given to the Trojans and to
Hector.
Trusting the sign and their own strength, they sought To break the mighty wall.
They tore the battlements from off the towers,

Threw down the parapets, and pried up pillars That first the Greeks had planted in the earth
To strengthen their defenses.
Dragging these away,
They hoped to shatter all the Achaean work; Yet still the Danaans held fast, and fenced
The parapets with ox-hide shields, and hurled Their weapons at the men below the wall.
The two Ajaxes went from tower to
tower,
Calling commands, and stirring up the strength Of all the Greeks. One man they urged with gentle Words, another they rebuked, whenever one Abandoned wholly the defense: “Friends of Argos, Whether you stand among the first,
the middle,
Or those less strong, this labor is for all.
You know that men are not alike in
war.
Let no man turn toward the ships when he hears Our cry; draw courage from your fellow, and Zeus,
The thunder-bearing Olympian, may grant
That we drive back the foe, and chase him even To the city.”

Thus they called out, and stones flew from both sides,
As snowflakes fall upon a winter day When Zeus has risen, stilling all the winds,
And pours the flakes upon the nourishing earth,
Covering the mountain peaks, the headlands,
The lotus-bearing plains, and all the works
Of men; it covers the gray sea, the harbors,
And beaches, and the wave that strikes the shore Holds the thick snow upon it. So the stones Flew thickly from both hands, and all the wall Roared underneath their fall.
Nor could the Trojans and bright Hector then Have broken through the gates and their long bar, Had Zeus, the counselor, not driven his own son, Sarpedon, at the Argives like a lion Turned upon cattle. Round before his breast
He held a rounded shield, beautiful, Beaten from bronze, which some smith hammered and Then lined with many hides of oxen, sewn
In circles, fastened with the golden rods.
Two spears he brandished, moving like a lion That hunger for the flesh has long consumed,

And fearless courage drives against the fold.
Even when shepherds, dogs, and spears guard there,
He is not ignorant of the attack: He either springs and carries off his prey,
Or, in the foremost, falls beneath a
spear.
So Sarpedon's heart urged him at the
wall
To tear the battlements away. He called
To Glaucus, son of mighty Hippolochus:
"Glaucus, why are we honored above all others
In Lycia—in our seats, our portions,
and
The fuller cups of wine? All men look on us
As on the gods, and we possess a great Estate beside the Xanthus: lovely orchards,
And wheat-bearing fields. Therefore we must stand Among the foremost, meet the burning fight,
That some Lycian in his close armor
say:
'Our kings do not rule Lycia without
glory.
They eat the fat sheep and drink excellent, Honeyed wine; but their strength too is noble, For they fight in the foremost ranks.'
"If fleeing from this war could make us always

Without old age or death, I would not fight Among the first, nor send you into danger Where men win glory. But the countless fates Of death stand near; no mortal can evade them.
Come, then: let us give another glory, Or let another give that glory to us." So he spoke; and Glaucus did not turn away, Nor would he refuse. Together they advanced,
Leading the great Lycian host.
Mnestheus, the son of Peteus, saw them come,
And shuddered, for they carried ruin toward His tower. He searched the wall for one who might Defend his friends, and saw the two great Ajaxes, Never weary in the war, and Teucer near,
Newly returned from his shelter. But the din Was so immense he could not make his voice
Be heard above the cries that reached the sky,
The blows on shields and horse-haired helmets, and The gates where every entrance was beset.
At once he sent the herald Thoötes:
"Run, noble herald, call the two Ajaxes.
Let both come here; the steep edge of destruction

Will soon be met. The Lycian leaders rise
With all the strength they showed in former battles.
But if the conflict has begun here too,
Let Telamonian Ajax come alone, The strong one, and let Teucer follow him, Skilled in the bow.”
The herald did not disobey. He ran Beside the wall, stood close to both the Ajaxes,
And spoke: “Leaders of the Argives in bronze,
The son of Peteus bids you come, that you May meet the labor here, if only for A little while. The steep edge of destruction
Will soon be met; the Lycian leaders
rise
With strength they showed in former battles. Yet,
If war has begun here also, let the son Of Telamon go on alone, and Teucer, Skilled in the bow, follow him.” Then great Telamonian Ajax
answered:
“You and strong Lycomedes remain
here,
And rouse the Danaans to fight with
all Their strength. I will go there and meet the battle, Then swiftly come again when I have brought Them aid.”
He spoke and went; his brother and
companion,

Teucer, went with him, while Pandion bore
The curved bows. When they reached Mnestheus’ tower, Where need was greatest, the Lycian leaders
Were mounting the battlements, like a black storm Descending. They joined the fight, and war’s cry rose.
First Telamonian Ajax killed Epicles, Companion of Sarpedon, with a stone
That tore the helmet and crushed the bones of his head.
Epicles had stood high within the
wall;
No man alive could easily have raised That weight in both hands. But Ajax lifted it
And threw it down; Epicles fell from the tower Like one who dives, and life left all his bones.
Then Teucer saw the arm of Glaucus bare,
Where the armor had slipped, and shot him as he came.
The arrow checked his battle-joy.
Glaucus
Leapt back unseen, that no Achaean might Behold his wound and boast of it aloud.
Sarpedon grieved to see his friend withdraw, Yet did not forget the fight. He struck Alcmaon, son of Thestor, with his
spear;

Then drew it forth, and Alcmaon fell face-first,
His ornamented armor clattering round him.
Sarpedon seized the parapet with both hands
And dragged it out; the whole work followed him,
And the wall above lay bare, a road made wide
For many men.
Ajax and Teucer met him. One shot struck
The shining strap that circled round the shield
Upon his breast; but Zeus preserved his son, Lest he should fall beside the ships.
Ajax
Leapt at the shield, yet could not pierce it; only
He drove Sarpedon back a little from The parapet. The Lycian did not yield,
But called among his people: "Why relax Your warlike strength? It is hard for me alone,
Though strong, to break the wall and open here
A road beside the ships. Come after
me;
The work grows better when many hands are joined."
He spoke; and, fearing their king's rebuke, they pressed More fiercely round their leader. On the other side
The Argives strengthened all their ranks within.

It seemed a mighty labor: neither could
The Lycians break the wall and make a road, Nor could the Danaans drive them back again
Once they had reached it.
They fought as two men striving over land,
With measures in their hands, upon a field Held in common, each defending an equal Strip of earth. So parapets divided
them;
Above the stones they struck each other's breasts, Beneath the ox-hide shields and round bucklers, The winged shields. Many were wounded by The pitiless bronze: some when they turned and left
The back exposed, and some straight through the shield.
The towers and parapets ran red with blood Of Greeks and Trojans, poured on either side.
Yet they could not make the Achaeans afraid.
They held like scales in a laboring woman's hand,
Who lifts each side alike—the wool and weight,
That she may win a wretched wage for children.
So equal were the battle and the war, Until at last Zeus gave the greater glory

To Hector, Priam's son, who first sprang inside
The Achaean wall.
Then Hector cried so all the Trojans heard:
"Horse-taming Trojans, rise! Break through the wall Of Argos, cast the wondrous fire
upon The ships!" They heard and rushed together. Some Climbed the parapets with their sharpened spears; But Hector seized a stone before the gates,
Thick at its base and sharp above.
Two men
Of those alive today could hardly lift It from the ground and set it on a wagon;
But Cronus' crooked-counseling son made light
The weight for Hector, and he swung it easily.
As a shepherd carries a ram's fleece, lifting
It in one hand, and scarcely feels its weight, So Hector bore the stone toward the planks
That held the lofty double gates.
Within,
Two cross-bars braced them, and a single bolt Lay fast across. He planted both his feet,
And hurled the stone into their middle, so The blow would not be weak. It broke the hinges;

The stone fell inward, and the gates thundered.
The bars could not restrain them; both the planks Burst apart beneath the stroke, one here, one there.
Then bright Hector sprang in, his face like night;
Dread bronze flashed around him, and in his hands He carried two spears. No man could have stopped Him as he leapt through, save the gods alone.
Fire burned in his eyes. He turned
among
The crowd and called the Trojans to cross over.
They climbed the wall; they poured through the gates.
The Danaans fled toward the hollow
ships,
And endless tumult rose among
them.

Source range: Book 12. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Hector lifts the stone as the Achaean wall gives way

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's a.Blake visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 13

First-pass working translation

When Zeus had driven the Trojans and Hector
Toward the ships, he left them there to labor,
And turned his shining eyes away, toward Thrace,
The land of horsemen, Mysians close in battle, Milk-drinking Abians, most just of
men.
He did not wholly turn his gaze to
Troy;
He thought no god would secretly arise
To help the Trojans or the Danaans.
But Earth-Shaker Poseidon watched the war.
He sat upon the highest wooded peak
Of Samothrace, and Ida, Priam's
town,
And all the Achaean ships lay in his sight.
He rose out of the sea, and pitied those Who were beneath the Trojans crushed, and felt
A bitter anger toward his brother
Zeus.
Down from the mountain's rugged side he came;
The ridges trembled and the forest shook Beneath the feet immortal. Three great strides

He made; the fourth brought him to Aegae, where His golden halls stand underneath
the sea, Unfading. There he yoked his bronze-hoofed steeds, Swift-flying, with their manes of gold; around His deathless body placed the golden gear,
And took a golden whip, well wrought, and mounted.
Across the waves he drove. The creatures of The sea played round him, knowing their own lord;
The waters opened, and the bronze axle stayed Dry underneath. His eager horses bore him Swiftly toward the Achaean ships.
There is a hollow cave beneath the sea, Midway between Tenedos and rugged Imbros.
Poseidon halted there, and loosed the
horses
From the chariot. He set ambrosial food Before them, laid unbreakable golden fetters Around their feet, that they might wait until Their lord returned; then entered the Achaean host.
The Trojans followed Hector like a storm,
Or fire, with an unwearied cry. They hoped

To take the ships and kill beside them all
The noblest men. But Earth-Shaker came up From the deep sea, and took the form and voice
Of Calchas, tireless in the battle.
First
He spoke to both the Ajaxes, eager for war:
“Ajaxes, you must save the Achaean
people, Remembering your strength, and not give way Before the chill of fear. Elsewhere I do not Fear the invincible hands of those who crossed
The wall; the well-greaved Greeks will hold them.
But here I fear the flame of Hector, who Boasts that he is the mighty Zeus’s
son.
May some god put this courage in your hearts:
Stand firm yourselves, and order all
the rest.
Then you could drive this rushing man away From the ships, though Olympus sent him on.”
With his staff the Earth-Shaker struck them both,
And filled their limbs with strength, so that their hands Grew light above, their feet below.
Then like A hawk that rises from a sheer cliff-edge

And darts across the plain in pursuit of a bird,
He sprang away.
Swift Ajax, son of Oileus, knew The feet departing, and addressed the greater:
“Ajax, some god who holds Olympus, wearing
The form of a prophet, bids us fight
beside
The ships. He is not Calchas; I have seen
The tracks of his feet behind him.
Gods are easy
To know. My heart now presses me more strongly Toward battle, and my hands and feet are eager.”
And Telamonian Ajax answered him: “So too my hands are eager round the
spear;
My strength has risen, and my feet already Move beneath me. I alone desire to meet Hector, whose hunger for the fight is never Satisfied.” So speaking, they rejoiced In that great courage breathed into their hearts;
And Poseidon roused the Greeks behind them,
Those who had cooled their grief beside the ships.
Their limbs were loosened by the grievous labor;
Their hearts grew faint when they beheld the Trojans Already past the wall. From underneath

Their brows they poured their tears, and thought there was No escape from ruin. But the god, assuming Another shape, went first to Teucer, Leitus, Peneleos, Thoas, Deipyros, Meriones, and Antilochus, The masters of the war-cry, and
spoke:
“Shame on you, young men of Argos!
I believed That you would save the ships. If you abandon This bitter war, today the Trojans win.
What marvel do I see—Trojans on our ships!
Before this they were like frightened deer
That wander through a forest and become
The food of panthers, wolves, and leopards;
They would not stand against the Achaean hands,
Not even for a little. Now, far off From their own city, they fight beside our ships, Because their chiefs are bad and their people will not Stand together. Even if Agamemnon Is wholly to blame, for he dishonored swift Achilles, it is not permitted us To leave the battle. Heal the wound at once;
Brave minds are physicians. You, the best in war,

Must not relax your strength. I would not blame
A man who held back, weakened by battle; yet
I am angry with you, for through this neglect You make a greater evil. Shame and just anger Enter each heart. Hector, skilled in the cry, Fights at the ships; he has broken gates and bar.”
So Earth-Shaker roused them.
Around the Ajaxes Strong ranks stood, ranks that neither Ares nor Athena, driver of hosts, would scorn.
They waited For Hector and the shining Trojans, shield
Against shield, spear answering spear, helmet Close to helmet, man pressed against his fellow.
The horsehair crests brushed; the spears shook forth From daring hands; and every eye looked straight Before it, eager for the fight.
The Trojans struck together, and Hector came Like a stone that a winter torrent, swollen By ruthless rain, breaks from a mountain’s rim
And drives high-leaping through the forest, till
It reaches level ground, where, though it rushes,

It no longer rolls. So Hector vowed to pass Through huts and ships, and kill, until he met
The close ranks; there his motion stopped. The Greeks Received him with their swords and spears, and drove Him back; he staggered. Then he called aloud:
“Trojans, Lycians, Dardanians, stand firm!
The Greeks will not hold me long, though now they stand Like towers. Beneath my spear they will give way, If Hera’s best and thunder-speaking husband Has truly roused me.” So he stirred the hearts Of every man.
Deiphobus, Priam’s son, moved through the ranks,
Holding his rounded shield before him. Meriones Aimed his bright spear and struck the bull-hide shield;
The shaft broke in its wood, and Deiphobus
Withdrew, fearing the spear.
Meriones,
Angered at his lost victory and broken weapon, Went to the huts and ships to fetch
another.
The others fought; the endless cry rose higher.
Then Teucer killed Imbrius, son of Mentor,

Rich in horses, who had lived in Pedasus
Before the Greeks arrived. He had made Priam’s Bastard daughter, Medesicasta, his wife;
But when the ships came, he returned to Troy, And Priam honored him as his own
sons.
Teucer struck beneath his ear; the spear came out,
And Imbrius fell like an ash upon A mountain, cut with bronze, whose tender leaves Lie scattered on the ground.
Teucer bent down to strip his armor.
Hector
Cast his bright spear; Teucer saw it coming,
And slipped aside a little from the point.
But Hector struck Amphinachus, son of Cteatus, Upon the breast; he fell, and all his
armor Rang. Hector sprang to seize the helmet fixed Upon his temples. Ajax rushed at
Hector
With his bright spear, but could not touch his flesh, For bronze enclosed him. Ajax struck the boss Of Hector’s shield and drove him back with force.
Hector withdrew from both the fallen men;
The Achaeans dragged them from the fight.

Poseidon's heart was angered when
his friend,
His grandson's comrade, fell. He went among The huts and ships, and roused the Danaans,
Making the Trojans grieve.
Idomeneus,
Famous for spear, came from a man just brought Back from the battle, wounded beneath the knee.
His friends had carried him within;
the chief Had given him to healers, yet his
heart
Still longed to enter war.
Then Earth-Shaker, assuming Thoas' voice—Thoas, Andraemon's son, who ruled Pleuron
And steep Calydon, and whose people honored Him like a god—called out: "Where are the threats With which the sons of Achaea threatened Troy?" The Cretan answered: "Thoas, no man here,
So far as I can tell, is wholly guilty.
We know the work of war; no man is held
By helpless fear, nor does his cowardice Persuade him to enter this evil battle.
Perhaps it is the will of Cronus' son That here, far from our Argos, nameless, we Should perish. But you, Thoas, who were brave

Before us, and rouse every man who yields,
Do not cease urging each." The god replied in that borrowed voice:
"May he who leaves the battle never come Again from Troy, but feed the dogs, and be Their music, who abandons it today.
Take up your arms and come; we must make haste, That we two may give help. Joined strength is good Even among the wretched; and you know How to fight in the ranks of the brave."
So speaking, he returned into the labor Of mortal men. Idomeneus reached his hut,
Put on his beautiful armor, and took spears.
He went out like the flash that Cronus' son Grasps from bright Olympus, shaking it as sign To mortals; so his bronze flashed round him as He ran.
Near the hut Meriones, his swift
companion,
Met him, and came to fetch a bronze spear. Then Idomeneus, strong in battle, asked:
"Meriones, dear son of Molus, why Have you left war and come here?
Are you wounded,

And does some point torment you?
Or do you bring A message? I have no desire to sit Within the hut; I long to join the
fight.”
Thoughtful Meriones replied: “Counselor
Of the bronze-clad Cretans, I have come
To see whether a spear remains for
me
To carry. Mine broke when I struck the shield
Of overbearing Deiphobus.” Idomeneus answered: “If you wish, you’ll find
One spear—or twenty-one—against the wall,
Bright weapons stripped from Trojans I have slain.
I am not one to fight my enemies From far away. Therefore I have spears,
Bossed shields, helmets, breastplates, shining bronze.” Meriones replied: “I too have spoils Beside my hut and black ship, but they lie Too far to fetch. I have not lost my courage;
Whenever battle rises, I stand first.
Another Greek may fail to know me
there,
But you have seen me.” “I know your courage,” Idomeneus said.
“Why tell me this? If now the best were chosen To lie in ambush by the ships, then courage

Would show most clearly, and the coward stand Apart from the brave. The coward changes color;
His heart will not allow him to sit still,
But shifts him foot to foot; his heart beats hard
As he imagines death, and his teeth chatter.
The brave man’s color does not change; he is Not greatly frightened when he takes his place,
But prays to enter quickly into grief.
“There your courage and hands could not be hidden.
Though missile struck you, or a spear reached you,
It would not find you from behind, but meet Your breast or belly as you went
among The foremost. Come, let us no longer stand Talking like children, lest some man rebuke us.
Go to the hut and take the mighty
spear.”
Meriones, the equal of swift Ares, Took up the bronze, and went beside
his friend,
Intent upon the work of war. As Ares
Goes into battle, and his dear son
Fear,
Strong and unflinching, follows him, who makes The boldest warrior tremble—so they went,

Armored in burning bronze.
Then Meriones asked: "Son of Deucalion, Where do you mean to plunge into the crowd—
The right wing, the middle, or the left? I do Not think the long-haired Greeks are short of war." Idomeneus replied: "Others defend The middle ships: the Ajaxes, and Teucer,
Best of the Achaeans with the bow, and good
In close combat. They will hold back
Hector,
However eager; hard it is for him To conquer their hands and courage, and to set
The ships aflame, unless the son of Cronus
Himself should cast a burning torch among them.
Great Ajax yields to no man, if he is mortal
And eats Demeter's grain. Bronze or huge stones May break him; even Achilles, breaker
Of ranks, cannot surpass him in close
fight,
Though no one runs as swiftly as Achilles.
We two shall hold the left, and quickly learn Whether we give another glory, or Another gives that glory to us." Meriones led on until they came To the appointed place. When the men beheld

Idomeneus, his comrade, and the
armor Elaborate upon them, all moved
near.
The battle rose around the sterns like storms
That race beneath shrill winds upon a day When dust lies thick upon the roads; the gusts Lift one great cloud of earth. So fighting met,
And every heart was bent on killing through
The crowd with sharpened bronze.
The deathly war Stood bristling with long spears that cut the flesh; Bronze flashed on helmets, breastplates newly polished, And bright shields. No man whose heart was not Of stone could look upon that labor without grief.
The sons of Cronus, each apart in thought,
Prepared bitter pain for heroic men.
Zeus wished the Trojans and their Hector glory,
Honoring swift Achilles; yet he did not Desire the Greeks to perish utterly Before the city, but to glorify Thetis and her strong-hearted son.
Poseidon, Stealing from the gray sea, roused
the Argives, Angered to see them mastered, and resentful

Of Zeus. One blood was theirs, one homeland; Zeus
Was born the elder, and knew more.
Therefore
Poseidon would not help them openly,
But moved among the army in a man's shape,
Stirring them secretly.
Between the hosts they stretched the boundary
Of bitter strife, a cord that could not break,
Yet loosened many men's knees.
There the grizzled Idomeneus called out to all the Greeks,
And sprang among the Trojans, putting fear
Into their hearts.
He killed Othryoneus, newly come From Cables to the fame of war. He had Asked Priam for Cassandra, fairest
daughter,
Without a bride-price, promising to drive
The sons of Achaea from the city.
Priam
Had nodded and accepted; trusting that promise, Othryoneus fought. Idomeneus aimed His shining spear and struck him in the chest.
As he fell, the Cretan mocked him:
"Will you now Marry Priam's daughter? We will give her you

Without a bride-price, if you follow me Back from the city. I too would promise this,
If you had come and asked the daughter of Agamemnon. But take her now beside
The ships: here is the wedding made."
He spoke, and sprang to strip the armor from
The fallen man.
Idomeneus struck Othryoneus as he sprang;
The bronze could not withstand him, and the spear Was fixed within the middle of his belly.
He fell and groaned. Idomeneus called out:
"Othryoneus, above all mortal men I praise you—if you truly will fulfill The promise made to Priam, and the king
Will give you his fair daughter. We too would bring The fairest daughter of the son of Atreus
From Argos, if you helped us take the city.
Come to the ships; we are not poor arrangers Of bride-gifts."
He spoke, and dragged the fallen by the foot Through battle. Asius came to help him, walking Before his horses; breathless, his driver held

The reins stretched tight above the horses' necks.
Asius took aim at Idomeneus, but he Struck first beneath the throat and through the bronze.
Asius fell like oak, or alder, or A tall pine felled by woodcutters for a ship,
New-sharpened axes ringing; so he lay Before his horses, roaring in the dust,
And clutching at his blood.
The driver, stunned, dared not turn back the team Through enemy hands. Antilochus, steadfast
In battle, struck him in the middle;
bronze
Could not contain the point, which entered deep Into his belly. From the polished car He fell, gasping; and Nestor's great-hearted son Drove off the horses from the Trojans, toward
The well-greaved Greeks.
Deiphobus came near, grieving for Asius,
And cast his shining spear.
Idomeneus
Saw it and slipped aside; his many-layered shield, Of ox-hide over bronze, received the stroke.
The spear flew over it, but still the hand
Was not made empty: Deiphobus struck down Hypsenor, son of Hippasus, beneath

The liver; suddenly his knees gave way.
Then Deiphobus cried: "Asius does not Lie without honor here. As he goes
down
To Hades' gates, he will rejoice that I Have sent a companion." The Greeks grieved,
And most of all the boast awoke the anger
Of warlike Antilochus. Yet even while He mourned his friend, he did not leave him; round
The body running, he held up his
shield.
Two faithful comrades, Mecisteus,
son
Of Echius, and splendid Alastor, bent
To lift the burden, and bore Hypsenor,
Groaning, toward the hollow ships.
But Idomeneus did not cease his strength.
He sought either to cover some Trojan
With dark night, or himself to fall with a crash While saving the Achaeans. There he struck Alcathous, son of Aesyetes, son-in-law Of Anchises. He had married Hippodamia,
The eldest daughter, loved beyond
the rest
By father and by honored mother; she

Surpassed her fellows in beauty, work, and mind,
And therefore the best man of broad Troy had made Her his own wife. But Poseidon made him fall Beneath Idomeneus: he bound his
limbs, Bewildered his bright eyes, and would not let Him flee, or turn away from the coming blow.
Idomeneus struck the center of his breast,
Like some tall pillar or a high-leaved tree.
The spear broke through the bronze tunic, once His defense; he cried, bent around the weapon,
And fell with thunder. The spear stood fast Within his heart; his struggling heart shook the point,
Until the mighty war-god left him.
Then Idomeneus shouted:
“Deiphobus,
Do you believe three men have fallen for one,
As you have boasted? Madman, stand before me,
That you may see what kind of son of Zeus
Has come here—Minos’ line, who first was born To Crete, the blameless king; and Minos’ son Was Deucalion, and Deucalion
fathered me,

The ruler of many men. These ships have borne Me here to bring destruction on your
father,
On you, and on the other men of
Troy.”
Deiphobus considered, turning two ways:
To call a great-hearted Trojan back, or test
The battle by himself. He judged it best
To go to Aeneas, whom he found behind
The crowd; for Aeneas was always angry
With Priam, since the king gave him no honor,
Though he was good among the men
of war.
He stood beside him: “Aeneas, counselor
Of Troy, defend your brother-in-law, if any Care for him remains. Come aid Alcathous, Who raised you in his house when you were still A child. Idomeneus, famous for the
spear,
Has struck him down and stripped
him.” Aeneas’ heart was stirred. He went at once Toward Idomeneus, intent upon the work
Of war. The Cretan did not shrink like a child;
He stood as a boar that trusts his strength among

The mountains, waiting for a crowd of men
Who rush against him in a lonely place.
His eyes flashed fire; he sharpened
his teeth,
Prepared to face both dogs and men.
So there Idomeneus stood waiting, and called out
To Ascalaphus, Aphareus, Deipyros, Meriones, and Nestor's son,
Antilochus,
The masters of the war-cry:
"Come, dear companions, stand beside me now, Though I am alone. I fear Aeneas'
strength;
He comes in youth's first flower, when strength is greatest,
And kills his enemies. If we were equal
In age and spirit, one of us would quickly
Carry away the victory." They came with one mind, and leaned their shields Upon their shoulders. On the other
side Aeneas called Deiphobus, Paris, and The godlike Agenor; and the people
followed,
As sheep follow their shepherd from the pasture,
And the shepherd's heart rejoices. So did he Rejoice to see the host go after him.
They rushed around Alcathous; the
bronze

Clashed terribly against their chests.
Two men,
Aeneas and Idomeneus, like Ares, Sought one another's flesh with pitiless bronze.
Aeneas cast; Idomeneus saw and
turned.
The point struck earth and quivered, having sprung
In vain from Aeneas' hand.
Idomeneus
Struck Oenomaus beneath the belly;
through
The hollow breastplate passed the spear, and drove Bronze through the entrails. In the dust he fell,
And grasped the earth with one extended hand.
Idomeneus drew forth the long-shadowed spear,
But could not strip the armor from
the dead:
The missiles pressed him, and his legs had lost Their power to leap. He could defend himself In close combat, but could not easily flee
The cast spear, or escape it.
Deiphobus, who had long held in his anger,
Cast at him as he slowly went away;
He missed, and struck Ascalaphus, the son
Of Enyalios, through the shoulder.
The spear
Held him; Ascalaphus fell and grasped the earth.

But Ares, loud and mighty, did not know His son had fallen. Bound beneath the will Of Zeus, he sat on high Olympus, under The golden clouds, as all the gods were kept Apart from battle.
The fighters rushed around Ascalaphus.
Deiphobus tore off his shining helmet; Meriones, the equal of swift Ares, sprang forward and struck Deiphobus' arm.
The cheeked helmet rang and fell from his hand.
Meriones sprang again, drew out the spear From where it entered, then withdrew among His comrades. Polites, Deiphobus' brother, Reached out his hand and led him from the fight To where the swift horses and chariot waited.
The others fought; the unquenchable cry rose.
Aeneas rushed at Aphareus, Caletor's son,
And struck his turned neck with the sharp spear.
His head leaned sideways; shield and helmet fell As death poured over him.
Antilochus saw
Thoon turn, sprang forward, and cut the vein

That rises up the back and reaches the neck.
He fell upon his back, stretching both hands Toward his friends. Antilochus rushed upon him, Stripped off the armor, and looked round; the Trojans Surrounded him, striking his bright broad shield.
They could not reach his tender flesh, for Earth-Shaking Poseidon guarded Nestor's son Among the many missiles.
Antilochus was never far from foes;
He wheeled among them, and his spear would not Rest, but shook and turned as he considered whom To strike, and where to close. He did not fail To see Adamas, Asius' son, who aimed Across the crowd. Adamas struck the center Of Antilochus' shield at close range.
But
The blue-haired god weakened the spear, hating His life: one half remained within the shield, Like a stake charred by fire; the other fell Upon the ground. Adamas withdrew, avoiding Fate. Meriones followed, and struck him Between the navel and the genitals,

Where Ares wounds most painfully.
The spear
Stood fast; he writhed as a bull herdsmen bind Against its will, and lead down from the hills.
For a short while he twisted; then Meriones
Came near and drew the spear from out his flesh,
And darkness covered both his eyes.
Menelaus aimed at Helenus; his arrow Struck the hollow of Menelaus' breastplate,
And sprang away, as beans or chickpeas leap
From a broad shovel in the breath of wind.
Menelaus cast his spear and pierced the hand That held the polished bow; the bronze went through.
Helenus withdrew among his friends, His wounded hand hanging. Agenor drew out
The ash spear and bound that hand with wool,
Soft from the sheep.
Then Peisander came straight against
the king,
For fate was leading him to death and to The victory of Menelaus. The spear Of Menelaus turned aside; Peisander Struck at the broad shield, but the bronze could not Pass through it; the shaft broke at its socket.
He rejoiced, hoping for victory. Then Menelaus drew his silver-studded sword

And sprang upon him. Peisander raised beneath His shield a battle-axe, bronze, long and bright,
With olive haft. They struck together: he Cut through the horsehair crest atop the helm;
Menelaus struck his forehead above The brow. The bones cracked; bloody eyes fell down Into the dust before his feet. He twisted,
And Menelaus set his foot upon His chest, stripped off the armor, and cried out:
"At last you leave the ships, you overweening Trojans, insatiable in shame and insult,
You evil dogs who dishonored me, and did Not fear the anger of loud-thundering Zeus, The god of guests, who will one day destroy
Your steep city. You carried off my wife,
My lawful wife, and much property, though she Had welcomed you; and now beside
the ships
You burn to cast destructive fire, and kill
The Achaeon heroes. But your warlike hunger
Will be restrained.

“Father Zeus, they say that you are wiser than All gods and men, and everything comes from you.
Yet see how you favor these insolent
Trojans,
Whose strength is never satisfied. All things
Have their fill: sleep, love, and sweet song and dance,
And each of these a man desires more deeply Than war. But Troy can never have her fill Of battle.”
He stripped the blood-stained armor, gave it to His friends, and went among the foremost. Then Harpalion, son of King Pylamenes, Sprang at him. He had followed his dear father
To Troy, and would not see his native land.
He struck the middle of the shield, but could Not drive the bronze through; drawing back, he looked Around him, fearing some man might reach his flesh.
Meriones sent a bronze-headed arrow
And struck him in the right buttock; it passed Beneath the bone, and through the bladder.
Harpalion sat within his friends’
arms, Breathing his life away, like a worm stretched

Upon the earth; the dark blood soaked the ground.
Paphlagonians lifted him into a car And bore him sorrowing toward sacred Ilium.
His father followed, weeping; no ransom could Restore his son.
Paris was angered at his guest-friend’s death,
And sent a bronze-tipped arrow.
Euchenor,
Rich and noble, son of seer Polyidus, Had known the fate his father told him: either
At home to die of grievous sickness, or Among the ships beneath the Trojan
hand.
He boarded, fleeing both the hateful illness
And fear of it; but Paris struck him under
The jaw and ear, and darkness took his limbs.
The battle burned. Hector, dear to Zeus, did not Know that the Argives on the left were now Destroying those he led. They might have won The glory, for Poseidon roused them
there;
But Hector stayed beside the ships of
Ajax
And Protesilaus, where the wall was low Above the gray sea, and the fighting fiercest.

There Boeotians, Ionians trailing robes, Locrians, Phthians, and Epeians rushed To save the ships, but could not drive away Bright Hector, flame-like, from the line.
Mnestheus led Athenians, with Pheidias, Stichius, and good Bias; Phyleides Meges, Amphion, and Dracius led The Epeians; Medon and Podarces The Phthians. Medon, Oileus' bastard son, And Ajax's brother, lived far from Phylace, For he had killed a kinsman of his stepmother.
Podarces was son of Iphiclus, Son of Phylacus. The Phthians fought In armor before their ships.
Swift Ajax, son of Oileus, no longer Stood apart from Telamonian Ajax.
They stood together like two wine-dark oxen That draw one plow across an even field;
The sweat rose round their horns beneath the yoke,
And only the bright plow divided them As they cut one furrow to its end.
Many good comrades followed Telamonian Ajax, Taking his shield when toil and sweat reached down To his knees. But no Locrians followed Ajax,

For they had no heart for close and hand-to-hand Combat: no bronze helmets with horsehair crests, No rounded shields, no ash spears.
They trusted
Bows and the carefully twisted wool of sheep, And came to Troy with arrows, breaking ranks From far behind the bronze-armed Trojans.
So some fought frontward with elaborate arms, While others, unseen behind, shot dense arrows And scattered Troy's courage.
The Trojans would have drawn away from ships And huts to windy Ilium, had not bold Polydamas stood near Hector and said:
"You are hard to persuade by another's words.
Because the god has given you the work of war, You wish in counsel too to know the most.
But no man takes all gifts: one man receives The war, another dancing, another song And lyre; and Zeus puts a far-seeing mind Within another, from which many profit, And he himself most of all.
"The battle's crown burns round you.
Those who crossed

The wall stand scattered; some have dropped their arms, And some fight at the ships, the fewer against The many. Withdraw, and call the leaders here,
That we may plan: whether we fall
among
The many-benched ships, if the god grants power, Or come away unharmed. I fear the Greeks
May find again the strength they had yesterday;
Beside the ships there remains one man who is Insatiable of war, and will not wholly Refrain.”
The counsel pleased him. Hector leapt from his car And spoke: “Hold all the best men here; I go To meet the battle, and will quickly return
When I have given orders.” He went through
The Trojans like a snow-covered mountain, shouting;
The others hastened to Polydamas.
Hector
Sought Deiphobus, Helenus, Adamas,
And Asius; none was safe. Some lay
beside
The ships, some within the wall, their lives gone out Beneath the Argive spears.
At last he found his brother Alexander,

The beautiful, beside the tearful
fight, Encouraging the Trojans. Hector stood
Near him and spoke with shame: “Paris, beautiful
In form, woman-mad deceiver, where are now Deiphobus, Helenus, Adamas, and Asius?
Where is Othryoneus? Ilium falls From its foundations; and your own steep death Is certain.” The godlike man replied: “Since you delight
To blame the blameless, I will leave the battle
More often yet; my mother did not bear me Without some courage. Since you brought the fight Beside the ships, we have not ceased to fight
The Danaans, and those you seek are dead.
Deiphobus and Helenus are gone, Both pierced through the hand; but Cronus’ son preserved Them from their end. Lead where your heart commands; We follow gladly, and our strength will not Fail while strength remains. Yet no man can contend Beyond his power.”
He turned his brother’s mind, and both went where
The battle raged around Cebriones, Polydamas, Phalces, Orthæetus,

Polyphates, Palmys, Ascanias, And Morys, leaders from fertile Ascania.
They came like storm-winds sent beneath the thunder Of Zeus, and met the sea with a great roar;
Wave followed wave and foamed upon the water.
So Troy came on in ranks, bronze flashing, leaders Among them. Hector led like murderous Ares,
Holding his many-layered shield before him.
He tested all the ranks, stepping before them
To see if they would yield beneath
the shield;
But still the Greeks did not give way.
Ajax strode wide and called him: “Come, madman, come!
Why frighten Argives? We are not strangers to The war; beneath the scourge of Zeus we have Been overcome. You hope to take our
ships,
But we too have hands to guard them. Soon your city, Well-peopled, might be taken by our
hands;
And for yourself the time is near when, fleeing,
You will pray that your horses outrun hawks,
And carry you in dust back to the town.”
As Ajax spoke, an eagle flew upon

The right; the Greeks cried out, encouraged by The sign. Bright Hector answered: “Ox-like fool, Speaker of empty words, would that I were always
The son of Zeus, and Hera had borne
me, Honored like Athena and Apollo—as surely As this day brings destruction to the Argives,
And you among them, if you stand and meet My long spear, which shall stain your tender flesh,
And feed the dogs and birds with fat and blood, Falling beside the Achaean ships.” So he led on; the Trojans followed with a cry Unlike a mortal sound. The Argives
answered,
And did not forget their courage, but awaited
The leaders. The two armies’ voices reached
The upper air and the bright rays of Zeus.

Source range: Book 13. Full-book provisional draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 14

First-pass working translation

Nestor was not unaware of all the cries, Although he drank; he spoke to Machaon: “Consider, noble son of Asclepius, How this affair will end. A greater cry Rises beside the ships of vigorous men.
Sit here and drink the shining wine until Hecamede, fair-haired, warms a bath and washes The blood away. I will go up to the watch And learn what has befallen.”
He took the bright shield of his own son, Thrasymedes, which lay within the hut,
And wore his father’s shield; then took a strong Spear sharpened in bronze, and stood outside.
At once he saw the shameful work: some Trojans Were driven, others drove the Greeks; the wall That had defended them lay overthrown.
As when the broad sea darkens under a wave,
And watches all the roads of shrill winds, yet neither Rolls forward nor retreats until a gust

Chosen by Zeus descends, so in his heart
The old man weighed two counsels: should he go Among the Danaans, or seek Agamemnon?
He judged it better to go to Atreus’ son.
The men were stripping one another in the fight;
The tireless bronze rang on their flesh beneath The swords and double-edged spears. Then Nestor met The kings that Zeus had fostered, coming up From ships pulled far from the gray sea: Tydeus’ son, Odysseus, and Agamemnon, all Wounded by bronze. The foremost ships stood toward The plain, and others had been drawn behind them;
The wall was built behind the sterns. The beach, Though broad, could not contain the ships, and so They filled the long mouth of the shore between The headlands. Leaning on their spears, the kings Came grieving, eager to know the battle.
Agamemnon said: “Nestor, great glory Of the Achaeans, why have you left the war?
I fear that Hector now fulfills the word

He spoke in Troy: he would not turn again
From the ships toward the city till he burned
Them with fire, and killed us too.
And now
His promise comes to pass. Ah me!
Perhaps
The other Greeks hold anger in their hearts Against me, as Achilles does, and will not Fight beside the sterns.” The horseman answered: “These things have come to be; Loud-thundering Zeus himself could not undo them.
The wall we trusted as an unbreakable Defense for ships and men lies overthrown.
Beside the ships they fight without a pause;
No watchman could discern from which direction
The Greeks are driven, so confused the deaths,
So high the cry. Let us consider what The mind can do; I do not counsel us To enter battle, for a wounded man Cannot make war.” Agamemnon answered: “Since they fight beside
The sterns, and neither wall nor trench has helped us—Though Danaans labored long to make them, hoping They would be walls no enemy could break—

It must be Zeus’ will that we perish
here, Nameless and far from Argos. Once I knew He gladly guarded us; now I know he honors
The Trojans, and has bound our strength and hands.
Come, let all follow what I say: drag
down
The ships nearest the sea into the water,
And moor them high upon the shore until
The deathless night, if then the Trojans cease.
In darkness we can draw the rest
away.
There is no shame in escaping evil, Even by night; better to flee disaster Than be taken.”
Odysseus looked at him and spoke:
“What word
Has escaped the fence of your teeth,
son of Atreus?
Would that you ruled some other worthless army,
And not us, whom Zeus has granted, from our youth Until old age, to endure grievous war Until each man is dead. You wish to leave
The broad-streeted city for which we suffer?
Be silent, lest another Greek should hear This speech, a speech no man of sound mind, who rules So many, would utter. I despise the thought

That while the battle holds you would draw down
The ships to sea, and make the Trojan victory
More certain, our destruction nearer.
The Greeks
Will not stand fast while ships are dragged away;
They will look back and leave the fight. Your counsel Will ruin us, commander of the people.” Agamemnon answered: “Your bitter rebuke Has reached my heart. Yet I did not command
The sons of Achaea to drag ships unwilling.
If only someone, young or old, would speak
A better plan, I would receive it gladly.”
Then Diomedes, good at the war-cry,
spoke:
“The man is near; we need not seek him long,
If you will obey and not resent my
words
Because I am the youngest. I too boast
A noble father, Tydeus, whom the heaped Earth covers now at Thebes.
Porthus had Three blameless sons in Pleuron and steep Calydon: Agrius, Melas, and Oeneus, horseman,
My father’s father, who surpassed them all.

He stayed there; my father wandered to Argos, As Zeus and all the gods desired. He married Adrastus’ daughter, and lived rich in grain, In orchards, sheep, and wide prosperity;
With his spear he surpassed the
Achaeans—
You would have heard it, if the tale is true.
Therefore do not dishonor what I say, Thinking my birth poor or my courage weak.
“Come, let us enter battle, though our wounds Compel us; then we will keep away from spears, Lest wound be added to a wound, and rouse
The others who have held back and no longer fight, Though once they aided us with all their hearts.”
They heard and followed him, and Agamemnon
Led on. Earth-Shaker was not blind to them;
He came among them in an old man’s likeness, Took Agamemnon’s right hand, and spoke: “Son Of Atreus, surely now Achilles’
heart,
Destructive, rejoices as he watches
Greeks
Flee and be slaughtered. He has no understanding.

Let him perish so; but the blessed
gods
Are not yet wholly angry with you.
The chiefs
Of Troy will soon raise dust across the plain,
And you will see them fleeing toward
the city
From ships and huts.” He shouted across the field. As nine or ten Thousand men cry in battle, so the god
Sent forth his voice and put great strength into
The hearts of all the Greeks, to fight and endure.
Hera of the golden throne saw from
Olympus
Her brother and her lord move through the battle, And rejoiced; but when she saw Zeus seated on
The many-springed Ida’s highest ridge,
Her heart grew bitter. Then august, ox-eyed Hera Considered how to trick the aegis-bearing god.
This seemed the best: to go to Ida adorned,
That he might desire her, and a gentle sleep
Fall on his eyes and understanding.
She entered
The chamber her dear son Hephaestus made,
Its close-fitting doors secured by a hidden key

No other god could turn. She shut the shining doors.
First she washed all stain from her lovely skin
With ambrosia, then anointed it with oil, Sweet and fragrant; when it moved through Zeus’ bronzefloored house, its scent reached earth and heaven. She Combed out her hair, and braided shining locks
From her immortal head. Athena’s
hands
Had worked the robe she put on, full of devices;
With golden pins she fastened it across Her breast. Around her waist she tied a belt
With tassels hundredfold; in pierced ears
She placed three-jewelled earrings, from which grace Shone greatly. Over all she drew a veil, Beautiful, new, and white as sun; and bound Her splendid sandals underneath her feet.
When all her adornment lay upon her body,
She left the chamber, and called Aphrodite
Apart: “Dear child, will you obey my
word,
Or will you anger because I aid the Danaans
While you aid Troy? Give me the love and longing

By which you conquer gods and mortal men.
I go to Oceanus and mother Tethys, Who raised me in their house when Rhea gave me
To them, when Zeus placed Cronus under earth And barren sea. I will settle their long quarrel, For anger has kept them from the bed of love.
If I can bring their dear hearts back
together,
They will call me forever dear and honored.”
Aphrodite smiled: “It is not possible, Nor fitting, to refuse you, since you sleep In Zeus’ embrace, the greatest.” From her breast
She loosened the embroidered strap in which All spells were woven: love, desire, and intimate Speech—words that steal the mind from thoughtful men.
She placed it in Hera’s hands: “Hide this varied Strap within your bosom; everything is wrought Inside it. You will not return unsuccessful In what your mind desires.” Ox-eyed and august,
Hera smiled, and hid it in her breast.
Then Aphrodite went to Zeus’ own
house,
While Hera, darting from Olympus, crossed Pieria and lovely Emathia, and sped

Above the snowy peaks of Thracian horsemen;
Her feet did not touch earth. From Athos she Crossed the swelling sea, and came to Lemnos, City of godlike Thoas. There she found Sweet Sleep, the brother of Death, and took his hand: “Sleep, lord of every god and every
man,
If ever you have heard me, hear me
now.
I shall be grateful all my days. Put soon
The shining eyes of Zeus to sleep, when I Have lain beside him. I will give you a Beautiful golden throne, imperishable;
My son Hephaestus shall make it, and a foot-Stool beneath, where you may rest your feet
When you sit at the feast.” Sweet Sleep replied: “August Hera, daughter
Of mighty Cronus, I could easily lull Another deathless god, even Oceanus,
From whom all things are born. But I would not come Near Zeus, nor put him into sleep, unless He gave the order. One command of yours Already taught me fear. When Heracles,

That overbearing son of Zeus, had sacked
The city, I wrapped the aegis-bearing
god
In gentle sleep; you raised harsh winds, and drove The hero far across the sea to Cos, Away from all his friends. When Zeus awoke,
He raged, and threw the gods throughout his house, Seeking me most of all. He would have cast Me unseen from heaven into the sea, Had Night, subduer of gods and men, not saved me.
I fled to her; and he, though angry, stopped,
For he feared doing anything displeasing To swift Night. Now you ask another impossible Thing of me.”
Ox-eyed Hera answered: “Sleep, why turn these matters In your mind? Do you think wide-seeing Zeus Now favors Troy as once he favored
them
In anger for his son Heracles? Come, And I will give you one of the younger Graces
To marry; she shall be your wife.” Then Sleep rejoiced: “Swear now beside the Styx,
The water no god can violate. With one Hand touch the nourishing earth, the other touch

The shining sea, and let the gods
beneath
The earth, the Titans, witness what we swear.
Swear you will give me Pasithea, one Of the young Graces, whom I have desired
Throughout my life.” Hera did not refuse. She swore as he asked,
And named the gods below, the Titans. When
The oath was complete, they left Lemnos and Imbros, Clothed in a mist, and swiftly made their way.
They reached Ida, rich in springs and mother
Of beasts, at Lecton, where they left the sea.
The forest-tops shook underneath their feet.
There Sleep remained, before Zeus could see him;
He climbed a long fir, tallest upon Ida,
Reaching the clear air, and sat among its branches Like a shrill bird the gods call Chalcis, men
Call Cypindis.
Hera climbed swiftly to the peak of Ida,
Gargaron; and the cloud-gathering god saw her.
Desire covered his prudent mind, as
on That first day when they joined in love, concealing

Themselves from both their parents.
Zeus stood before her:
“Hera, why have you come so eagerly From Olympus? Your horses and your car Are nowhere here for you to ride.” She answered, plotting: “I go to visit Oceanus,
The father of the gods, and mother Tethys,
Who raised me in their house when Rhea gave Me to them, after Zeus had set down
Cronus
Beneath the earth and barren sea. I go
To settle their unending quarrel;
long
They have kept separate from bed and love Since anger entered them. My horses wait Upon Ida’s far ridge, and they will carry Me over the nourishing earth. For your sake
I came from Olympus, lest you should be angry
If I went silently to Oceanus.” Cloud-gathering Zeus replied: “There will be time To visit them; but now let us turn to love
And lie together. Never has desire So flooded and mastered me for goddess or woman—
Not for Ixion’s wife, who bore Pirithous, Wise as the gods; not Danaë, who bore

Perseus, most renowned among men; nor her Whom Phoenix fathered, who bore Minos and Godlike Rhadamanthys; not Semele, Nor Alcmene, mother of strong Heracles;
Not Demeter, lovely-haired; not glorious Leto;
Not even you. As I desire you now, So sweet a longing takes me.” Hera replied, still plotting: “Terrible
son
Of Cronus, what a word! If you desire
To lie together here on Ida’s peaks, Where all things are in sight, how would it be If some immortal saw us, told the
gods,
And I could not return to your own house After rising from the bed? That would be shame.
But if you wish it, and it pleases you,
There is the chamber your dear son Hephaestus
Made, with close-set doors fastened to their posts.
Let us go there, since the bed pleases
you.”
Cloud-gathering Zeus answered: “Hera, do not fear That god or man will see us. I will cover Us with a golden cloud so dense that even
The Sun, whose sharp light sees the furthest, could not Look through it.”

The son of Cronus caught his wife within His arms. Beneath them the divine earth sent up New grass, wet lotus, crocus, hyacinth,
Dense and soft, lifting them above the ground.
Around them shone a golden cloud,
and bright Dew fell from it. There the father slept Quietly on Gargaron, conquered by sleep And love, and held his wife.
Sweet Sleep ran to the Achaean ships, to bring The word to Earth-Shaker Poseidon.
Near Him standing, he spoke: "Now aid
the Danaans
With a willing heart, and grant them glory for A little while, while Zeus is sleeping.
I
Have covered him with soft sleep; Hera deceived Him into lying with her." Sleep went away among the famous races
Of men. Poseidon urged the Greeks with greater Force, and sprang among the foremost: "Argives, Shall we give victory to Hector, son Of Priam, let him take the ships and win
The glory, since he says Achilles remains

Beside his ships, angry within his
heart?
We shall not miss him greatly if we rouse
Each other and defend ourselves. Put
on
The finest, largest shields; cover your heads With brightest helmets; take the longest spears.
I lead you, and Hector, eager as he is,
Will not stand before us. Let the man who bears
A little shield give it to one less strong,
And enter underneath the larger
shield."
They heard and did it. The wounded kings, Diomedes, Odysseus, and Agamemnon, ordered
them,
Changing the armor: the brave man took the good,
The weaker took the lesser. When the bronze
Was fastened round them, they went forth. Poseidon Led them, holding in his great hand a terrible
Sword, long and sharp, like lightning. No man could Mingle with it in hateful battle; fear Held every fighter back. On the other side
Bright Hector ordered Troy.
Then blue-haired Poseidon and bright Hector stretched The dreadful contest between the hosts—one

For Troy, one for the Argives. The sea stirred Toward huts and ships; the armies came together With a tremendous cry. No wave that bitter North wind raises roars so loud
against
The land; no forest fire speaks so fiercely;
No wind cries so among the high-branched oaks, When anger drives it—such the cry of Troy
And Achaea.
The cry was terrible as they rushed on one Another. Hector cast first at bright
Ajax,
Who faced him; but the two sword-belts across The breast of Ajax—one for shield, one for The silver-studded sword—saved his flesh.
Hector was angered that the weapon flew
In vain, and withdrew among his friends, escaping
The fates.
But great Telamonian Ajax, as he went,
Lifted a stone from fragments of the
ships
That rolled beneath the feet of fighting men.
He struck him near the neck, above the rim
Of that great shield. As when a tree falls, torn

Up by the roots beneath the thunderbolt
Of Father Zeus, and the harsh scent of brimstone Rises from it, so Hector's strength fell quickly Into the dust. He let the spear fall from His hand; shield, helmet, and his ornamented Armor rang around him.
The Greeks rushed on with one great shout, and hoped To drag him off, and cast their close-set spears;
But none could wound him, for the best of Troy Surrounded him: Polydamas, Aeneas, Agenor, Sarpedon, leader of Lycia, And blameless Glaucus. None neglected him.
They held their rounded shields before his body, While lifting arms bore him through the war
To horses waiting with their car and driver.
They carried him, groaning, toward
the city.
When they came to the ford of broad Xanthus,
The river born to Zeus, they lifted
him
From the horses, laid him on the ground, and poured Water upon him. He breathed again, opened His eyes, sat on his knees, and vomited

The dark blood. Then backward on the earth he fell;
Black night covered his eyes, and still the missile Held fast his heart.
When the Argives saw him carried
away, They sprang more fiercely at the Trojans and Remembered courage. Swift Ajax,
son
Of Oileus, first struck Satnius, son Of Enops, whom a water-nymph had borne Beside the Satnioeis to the herdsman.
Ajax struck him in the flank; he turned and fell,
And Trojans and Achaeans closed around
His body in a hard and crowded
fight.
Polydamas, the son of Panthous,
came
To guard him, and struck Prothoenor, son
Of Areilycus, in the right shoulder.
The heavy spear held him; he fell into
The dust and grasped the earth.
Polydamas cried:
“Surely the spear did not leap forth in vain
From Panthous’ son; an Argive takes it now Into his flesh, and leaning on the
spear
Will descend, I think, into the house of Hades.”
The Greeks grieved at his boast; most deeply Ajax,

For Prothoenor had fallen near him.
Ajax
Cast his bright spear; Polydamas leapt aside
And slipped away from death.
Archelochus,
Son of Antenor, received the point where
The head and neck are joined, the last vertebra.
It severed both the tendons; head and mouth
And nostrils struck the earth before his knees.
Ajax called to blameless Polydamas: “Consider, tell me truly: was not he Worth the life of Prothoenor? He appears No common man, nor born of common people;
He was the brother or the son of horse-Taming Antenor, and his lineage was Nearest to yours. You knew him well.” The Trojans Were seized by grief.
Acamas struck Promachus, a Boeotian, Who stood above his brother, and dragged him
By both his feet. Acamas shouted: “Argives, Insatiate in arrows and in threats, this labor
And misery shall not be ours alone.
You too shall die here. Remember how Promachus sleeps, subdued beneath
my spear,

That vengeance for his brother may not long Remain unpaid. Perhaps some man at home Will pray he left a kinsman to defend
him.”
The Greeks grieved; and Peneleos was stirred.
He sprang at Acamas, who did not wait,
And struck Ilioneus, son of Phorbas, Rich in sheep, whom Hermes loved and gave great wealth.
His mother had borne him as her only child.
Peneleos struck beneath his brow, where eye
And socket meet; the eye was driven
out,
The spear went through to nape.
Ilioneus
Sat with both hands spread. Peneleos drew
His sword, cut through his neck, and severed head And helmet; the strong spear stood in the eye.
He lifted it like a poppy, and displayed
It to the Trojans: “Tell Ilioneus’ Dear father and his mother to mourn him there.
Nor shall the wife of Promachus,
daughter
Of Alegenor, greet her husband when He comes with all the sons of Achaea from Troy.”
At this, trembling seized the Trojan
limbs;

Each man looked round for some escape from death.
“Tell me, O Muses, who possess
Olympus,
Who first took up the bloody spoils, when famous Earth-Shaker turned the battle.”
Telamonian Ajax first struck Hyrtius, son of Gyrtius,
Leader of the strong-hearted Mysians. Then Antilochus stripped Phalces and Mermes; Meriones struck Morys and Hippotion; Teucer took Prothoön and Periphetes;
And Atreus’ son struck Hyperenor in The flank. The bronze poured out his entrails, and His soul went through the wound; darkness covered Both his eyes. Ajax, son of Oileus, Took the greatest number, for no fleeing man Could keep his pace when Zeus raised terror in Their limbs.

Source range: Book 14. Full-book provisional draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 15

First-pass working translation

When Zeus awoke upon the peak of Ida,
Beside the golden-throned Hera, first He saw the Trojans and the Argives driven,
Poseidon moving with them, and bright Hector Lying upon the plain, and vomiting
blood
After the stone of Ajax. Pity touched The father, but he looked upon his wife
With darkened eyes: "You have contrived this, Hera; Your helpless trick has stopped the shining Hector And frightened all his people. I do not know Whether you will be first to profit from Your painful fraud, or whether I must scourge you.
Do you remember when I hung you
from
The upper air, two anvils at your feet,
An unbreakable golden chain around Your hands? You hung in cloud; the gods could not Come near to free you, and whoever I seized
I hurled from heaven's threshold until he reached The earth, scarcely alive. Yet even then

The pain of Heracles did not leave my heart—
Him whom, after persuading the North Wind,
You sent across the barren sea to Cos, Far from his friends. I rescued him and brought Him back to horse-pasturing Argos.
I remind
You now, that you may cease this treachery,
And learn what love and bed can profit you,
For which you left the gods and came apart
To deceive me." Ox-eyed Hera trembled: "Let the
earth,
Wide heaven above, and Styx's descending water,
The greatest oath among the blessed
gods,
Bear witness; let your sacred head and our Marriage bed bear witness, by which I never Would swear a falsehood. Poseidon does not harm
The Trojans and their Hector for my sake;
His own heart urged him, and he pitied those Who suffered by the ships. I would myself Advise him to go where you command."
The father smiled: "If you were always one

In mind with me, Poseidon would soon bend His purpose to our own. But if you speak
The truth, go now among the gods, and call
Iris and Phoebus of the famous bow.
Let Iris enter the bronze-clad Greeks And tell Poseidon to abandon war, And go among the gods or to the sea.
Let Phoebus rouse up Hector, breathe strength in him, Make him forget his pains, and turn
the Greeks
To helpless flight, until they fall among
The ships of Peleus' son. Then Hector shall Stir Patroclus to action; and bright
Hector
Will kill him before Ilium, after he Has slain the strongest young men, Sarpedon
Among them. Then Achilles, in his anger,
Will kill bright Hector. From that hour I shall Make the Achaeans drive the Trojans
back,
Until they take the city through the counsels
Of Athena.
"Before that hour I will not cease my
anger,
Nor let another deathless god defend The Danaans, until the wish of Peleus' son Is finished, as I promised and confirmed

With my own head, when Thetis clasped my knees
And begged me to give honor to
Achilles." Hera did not disobey. She left the ridge
And came to broad Olympus, swift as thought Of a man who, having crossed a stretch of land, Turns in his mind where he has been and where He will go next. There among the gods she came.
They rose and offered cups; she took one from Fair-cheeked Themis, who had run to meet her first.
Themis asked: "Hera, why have you come? You look As if you were afraid. Has Cronus'
son,
Your husband, frightened you?"
"Do not ask this,"
She answered. "You know how harsh and overbearing His heart is. Begin the equal feast among
The gods, that all may hear what evils Zeus Reveals. I do not think that every
heart, Divine or mortal, will rejoice in
them, Though one may sit contented at the feast."
She sat; the gods were troubled in the house.
She smiled with lips alone; her dark brows did not

Grow bright. "Fools, why rage against him in our blindness?
Do we still think to stop him by our
words Or force? He sits apart, and says that none
Of the immortals equals him in
strength.
Endure whatever evil he may send.
I think that Ares has already learned Disaster; his dear son Ascalaphus Has fallen, whom fierce Ares calls his own."
Ares struck his thighs and groaned:
"Do not resent
Me, Olympians, if I go to the ships And avenge my son, although it is my fate
To lie in blood beneath the thunderbolt."
He ordered Fear and Terror to yoke the horses,
And armed himself in shining
bronze.
Then fiercer anger would have risen
beside
The throne of Zeus, had not Athena, fearing
For all the gods, leapt from the doorway, left Her seat, removed the helmet and
the shield
From Ares, laid his spear aside, and
said:
"Madman, your mind is ruined. You have ears
But do not hear; no sense remains, no shame.
Did you not hear what white-armed Hera said,

Returning from the presence of the god?
Would you, after doing many evils,
come Against your will to Olympus, bringing harm
To all the rest? Zeus will leave the Trojans
And Greeks to themselves, then come among us, seizing Each one, the guilty and the guiltless.
Give
Up anger for your son; a stronger
man
Has fallen, or will fall. It is not easy To rescue every generation born." She seated furious Ares on his throne.
Then Hera called Apollo and swift Iris,
The messenger: "Zeus commands you both to go To Ida with all speed. When you have looked Upon his face, do whatever he commands."
She returned to her throne; the two went forth.
They found the son of Cronus seated
on Gargaron, crowned by fragrant cloud. He did not Grow angry when he saw them, for they had done His wife's command. He spoke to Iris
first:
"Go, swift Iris, tell Poseidon all my
word:
Abandon battle; go among the gods,
Or to the shining sea. If he refuses,

Let him consider whether, strong as he is,
He can endure my coming. I am stronger
And older by birth, though his heart does not Admit the name the other gods all
fear.”
Swift Iris flew from Ida like the snow Or cold hail driven from clouds beneath the North Wind. She stood by dark-haired Earth-Shaker and spoke: “Earth-holder, I bring Zeus’ command: abandon The battle, and go among the gods or to The sea. If you refuse, he threatens to Come face to face, and tells you to avoid His hands, for he is stronger and older born.”
The glorious god groaned: “He has spoken with Too much arrogance, if he would force by strength An equal. We are three, born to Cronus
And Rhea: Zeus, myself, and Hades, lord
Of the dead below. The world was divided Three ways; each took his portion.
Mine is the gray Sea, Hades’ the darkness, Zeus’ the broad heaven;
Earth and high Olympus remain common.
I will not live according to his mind.

Let him remain within his third, however Strong. Let him not frighten me like a coward With threats; let him command his children so.” Iris answered: “Shall I carry this hard word
To Zeus? The mind of a brave man can turn;
And you know well that the Erinyes follow
The elder.”
“You have spoken rightly,” he replied.
“It is bitter when one equal in honor And allotted fate rebukes another.
Yet, though resentful, I will yield.
Hear this:
If without me Athena, Hera, Hermes,
And lord Hephaestus spare the steep
city,
And Zeus refuses to destroy it, giving The Argives victory, our quarrel then Will never be healed.”
So he withdrew; the sea received
him.
The Achaeans missed him as he sank
beneath
The sea. Then Zeus spoke to Apollo: “Go now
To Hector, bronze-clad.
Earth-Shaker has gone down To the bright sea, avoiding my anger; For others born to Cronus would have heard
Our quarrel. Better that he yields, since he Could not complete his work without great toil.

Take up the tasseled aegis, shake it before
The Greeks, and terrify them. Let your care Be Hector: rouse his courage until all The Achaeans flee toward ships and Hellespont.
Then I shall guide the work and word, so that They breathe again after their labor.
“Before the wish of Peleus’ son is done,
I will not cease my anger, nor permit An immortal to defend the Greeks.
So
I promised Thetis when she clasped my knees
And begged me to give honor to
Achilles.”
Apollo obeyed. He went from Ida
down
Like a hawk, swiftest among birds, and found
The son of Priam sitting, no longer fallen;
His spirit gathered, and he knew the
friends Around him. Sweat and breath had ceased; the mind Of Zeus had roused him. Phoebus stood beside:
“Why do you sit apart, faint son of Priam?
Has some grief reached you?”
Hector, still weak, replied: “Who are you, best among the gods, that ask Me face to face? Do you not know that Ajax

Struck me beside the sterns, killed
my companions,
And stopped my courage? I believed that I Would reach the dead and Hades’ house today.” Apollo said: “Take heart. The son of Cronus
Sent me from Ida to defend you. I Am Phoebus, who have saved you and the city.
Rouse now the many horsemen; drive their cars Against the ships. I will go before
you,
Make smooth the road, and turn the Greeks away.”
He breathed great courage into Hector. As
A horse kept in the stall, well fed, breaks free
And runs clattering over the plain, accustomed
To bathe within a river, proud, his mane Flowing, his knees carrying him quickly through The fields and pastures he has always known—
So Hector moved his feet and knees, and roused
The horsemen when he heard the god’s voice.
The Greeks came after like hounds and men who chase A horned deer or wild goat, until a rock
Or shadowed forest saves the prey; then a

Bearded lion appears before them, turns Them all, however eager. So the Greeks,
While they could follow, struck with sword and spear;
But seeing Hector move among the
ranks,
Fear took them, and their courage fell beside
Their feet.
Then Thoas, son of Andraemon, best Among Aetolians, skilled with spear and good
In close combat, spoke: "What a wonder! Hector rises, Escaping death. We all expected Ajax To kill him. Some god has rescued him, who loosed The knees of many Danaans; and he will Do so again. Hector does not stand here Without the thunder of Zeus. Send back the host Toward ships; we who claim the foremost rank will stand And first attempt to stop him. Even
Hector,
However eager, will fear to enter us." They heard and obeyed. Around King Idomeneus
And Ajax they arrayed Teucer, Meriones,
And Meges, calling the best to stand against
The Trojans, while the multitude withdrew
Toward the Achaean ships.

The Trojans struck together, led by Hector's stride;
Before him Phoebus walked, a cloud
around
His shoulders, holding the dread aegis, tasseled, Shaggy, which Hephaestus made and gave to Zeus For terror among men. Apollo held It and led on the people. The Greeks stood Together; a sharp cry arose from both.
Arrows leapt from strings, and many spears went forth.
Some fixed in flesh; some stood midway in earth,
Before they reached the white skin, hungering
For flesh.
While Phoebus held the aegis still,
the spears Reached both sides and men fell. But when he shook
It straight before the swift Danaans,
and Himself cried terribly, he bewitched
their hearts.
They forgot their strength. As two wild beasts scatter A herd of cattle or a flock of sheep In the black night, when no herdsman is there, So was the courage of the Greeks driven away.
Apollo gave the glory to the Trojans
And Hector.
Man killed man as the ranks broke.
Hector struck

Stichius, leader of the bronze-clad Boeotians,
And Arcesilaus, friend of Mnestheus.
Aeneas stripped Medon and Iasus.
Medon, Oileus' bastard son and brother
Of Ajax, lived in Phylace far away, After he killed his stepmother's kinsman.
Iasus led Athenians, son of Bucolus.
Polydamas killed Mecisteus; Polites struck Echius at the first clash; Agenor killed Clonius; Paris struck Deiochus fleeing,
Low in the shoulder, in the foremost
ranks.
While Troy stripped the fallen, the Greeks fled through The trench and stakes, driven here and there,
And entered their own wall by force.
Then Hector
Cried out: "Rush toward the ships; leave human spoils.
Whoever I find apart from them, I'll bring His death there; his kindred will not claim him, But dogs will drag him before our
city."
He lashed his horses, drove along the
ranks;
The Trojans shouted and kept close their cars.
Apollo went before them, and with ease Trampled the banks of the deep trench, throwing them

Into its middle, making a long broad road,
As far as when a man tests strength with a spear.
The Trojans poured in phalanx. He bore the aegis
And threw the wall down, as a child
beside
The sea builds toys of sand, then kicks them flat.
So, Phoebus, you confused the Greeks' long labor,
And roused their flight.
They stood beside the ships and called to gods, Lifting their hands. Nestor, horseman, raised his own:
"Father Zeus, if ever in rich Argos someone Burned fat thighs of ox or sheep, and prayed to sail Back home, and you promised, nodding, remember now,
And keep the Greeks from this pitiless day.
Do not let Troy master us." He prayed; and Zeus thundered greatly, hearing him,
The old son of Neleus. When the Trojans heard
The thunder of the aegis-bearing
god,
They sprang more fiercely and remembered courage.
As a great wave from the broad sea falls upon
A ship's wall when the wind drives it, lifting waves Most high, so Troy crossed the wall with one great cry.

They drove their horses among the sterns, and fought With spears at close range; some from chariots, Some mounting the dark ships, wielding long poles laid Upon the decks, shod with bronze for sea-fight.
While the Trojans and Achaeans fought before
The swift ships, Patroclus in the hut Of generous Eurypylus remained, With kindly words and medicines
upon
The grievous wound, to hush its black pain.
But when he saw the Trojans surging over The wall, and heard the Danaans cry in fear,
He groaned, and struck his thigh, and called aloud: “Eurypylus, I cannot stay, though gladly
I would help you; such a battle has arisen.
Let your companion tend you; I will run
To great Achilles, and persuade him, if The gods should grant my words to move his heart.
Good is the counsel brought by a friend in need.” Away he went. The Argives still stood firm, Though fewer, by the ships; nor could they drive
The Trojans back, nor let them through the ranks

To mingle with the huts and vessels.
There
The battle held its balance, straight as when A craftsman lays a rule against a beam,
Who knows each art Athena taught to men.
Around one ship great Ajax and Hector fought,
And neither could compel the other
back;
The god had joined them there for that hard labor.
Ajax, Clytius’ son, struck Caletor Within the breast, as he bore fire toward
The ship. He fell, and from his loosened hand
The torch dropped flaming. Hector saw his cousin Fall in the dust before the dark-prowed ship,
And called to Trojans and Lycians: “Do not give way within this narrow place!
Save Clytius’ son, lest Argive hands strip off His armor when he falls among the
ships!”
He cast his shining spear at Ajax, but It missed its mark and struck Lycopyhron,
Mastor’s son, a Cytherean guest And Ajax’s companion, who had lived Within his house since blood-price drove him out From sacred Cythera. Hector’s spear

Struck him above the ear; backward he fell
From off the stern into the dust, his limbs Loosened beneath him. Ajax shuddered, then Called to his brother: “Teucer, our faithful friend is slain—the man
We honored in our house as if our parents
Had borne him. Hector has cut him
down.
Where are your death-swift arrows and your bow,
The gift Apollo gave you?”
Teucer heard,
And came beside him with his crooked bow
And arrow-bearing quiver. He shot
down Cleitus, son of Peisenor, who held The reins beside Polydamas, his friend.
He labored hardest where the horses drove
The thickest ranks for Hector and
the Trojans;
The sudden arrow entered through his neck.
He fell from the chariot, and the horses
Rang empty harness. Polydamas saw, Ran before them, and gave them to Astynous, Protiaon’s son, commanding him to hold Them close; then hurried back into the front.

Teucer drew one more arrow against
Hector,
And might have ended all his fighting there, Had Zeus not guarded Hector from that fate.
The newly twisted bowstring broke as Teucer Bent back the bow; the bronze-tipped arrow veered, And bow and string fell from his hands. He cried:
“A god has rooted out our battle-plans!
He cast my bow away and snapped the string
I twisted this same morning, that it might Endure the arrows leaping from it.” Then Ajax,
The great Telamonian, answered
him: “Let bow and arrows lie. The god has mixed
Them into grief for the Danaans.
Take
The long spear and the shield upon your shoulder; Fight, and rouse the rest. Let not the enemy
Take our well-benched ships without a struggle.
Remember now the courage we have learned.”
Teucer set the bow within the hut, and hung
The fourfold shield around his shoulders. He put The horse-haired helmet on his head; its crest

Nodded above him terribly. He seized
The bronze-sharpened spear and took his stand Beside his brother.
When Hector saw the arrows blunted, he called: “Trojans, Lycians, Dardanians, remember
Your strength, and be men beside the hollow ships!
The arrows of a foremost man a god Has turned aside. The strength Zeus gives to men Is known in this: to one he grants great glory,
Another he diminishes—as now He lessens Argive might and helps us. Fight
In one mass by the ships. Let him who falls
And meets his death lie dead; there is no shame In dying for the fatherland. His wife, His children, house, and unviolated fields
Remain secure if Argive ships depart And sail at last toward their beloved land.”
His speech stirred every heart. Ajax cried
From the other side: “Shame, Argives! Now we must Either be saved or perish. Do you hope That when Hector takes the ships each man will walk Back to his fatherland? Do you not hear

How he commands his people to burn them?
He calls no dance; he calls us to the fight.
We have no counsel better than to join
Our hands and strength together.
Better to die At once, or live, than waste our breath beside The ships beneath men worse than we.”
Their hearts were stirred. Then Hector struck Schedius, Perimedes’ son, the Phocian leader; Ajax struck Laodamas, Antenor’s
son,
The footmen’s captain. Polydamas
killed
Otus, companion of Phyleus, chief Among the great-hearted Epeians.
Meges
Sprang at Polydamas; he bent
beneath
The spear, and Apollo would not let Panthous’ son
Fall there. Instead Meges struck Croesmus
Within the chest; he fell with a crash, and Meges Stripped the bronze armor from his shoulders.
Then Dolops, skilled with spears, sprang at Meges.
His spear struck the shield’s middle, but the close Fitted breastplate saved him—the guest-gift once Brought from Ephyra by Phyleus, given

By King Euphetes to protect a friend In war, and now protecting Phyleus'
son.

Meges struck the horse-haired helmet's crest

And broke away its plume; the helmet fell

Into the dust like a young palm-tree newly

Cut down, still shining. As he fought and hoped

For victory, warlike Menelaus came To stand beside him, hidden, and drove his spear

Into Dolops' shoulder from behind.
The bronze passed through his chest; forward he fell.

They moved to strip the dead man's armor off,

When Hector called his brothers, and first rebuked

Melanippus, Hicetaon's son, who once

Had grazed his cattle far from battle, near

Perkote. While the ships were still
away,

He lived apart; but when they reached the land,

He came to Troy and shone among its spearmen.

When the curved ships had come,
Melanippus

Returned to Ilium, and beside the
house

Of Priam made his dwelling; Priam honored him

As he would honor any of his sons.

But Hector called him by his name and said:

"Will you, Melanippus, rest? Have you no shame Within you for your cousin who has fallen?

Do you not see the Achaeans carrying off

The armor of Dolops? Come with me. No room

Remains for fighting from afar with Argives:

We must either slay them, or take steep Troy

And all her people."

He spoke, and led the way;

Melanippus,

Godlike, followed at his side. Great
Ajax

Urged the Argives: "Be men, friends, and set shame

Within your hearts; respect each other in

The hard encounter. When men remember

Their fellows, more are saved than slain; but flight

Of cowards brings no glory and no
strength."

He spoke; and they desired to drive the danger

Away, and took his words into their hearts,

Fencing the ships with bronze. Then Zeus awoke

The Trojans' courage. Menelaus called

To young Antilochus: "No Achaean is

Younger than you, or swifter on his feet,

Or braver in the fight. Leap forth, and strike
Some Trojan down.”
He sprang among the foremost, Looked round, and cast his shining spear. The Trojans Drew back before it, yet the spear did not Fly vainly: Melanippus, Hicetaon's
son, Returning from the battle, took the bronze
Below the breast, beside the nipple.
Down
He fell; black darkness covered both
his eyes.
Antilochus leaped upon him as a hound Upon a wounded fawn, when from its lair
The hunter strikes it, loosening its
limbs.
So on Melanippus, exulting in war, He sprang to strip the armor. Hector saw,
And came running through the battle to oppose him.
Antilochus, though swift and practiced, did not Await him. Like a beast that has done a deadly Deed and flees the crowd that gathers after it Has killed a dog or herdsman by the herd,
So fled the son of Nestor. Hector and The Trojans poured their groaning shafts behind him, Until he turned and stood among his friends.

Then like flesh-eating lions Troy rushed on The ships, fulfilling Zeus's will. He roused Their courage, bewitched the Argives' hearts, And took their glory from them. For he wished To grant the greater glory to brave
Hector,
That he might cast the fire of heaven
upon
The curved ships, and complete the dreadful prayer Of Thetis. Zeus desired to see himself
The bright flame of a burning vessel;
then
He would drive Troy in flight away from the ships,
And give the Danaans their glory
back.
For this he roused great Hector beside the ships—
Though Hector needed no such urging—raging Like spear-fighting Ares, or a fire That tears through mountain forest.
Foam stood round His mouth; beneath his terrible brows his eyes Flashed, and his helmet shook above his temples.
Zeus from the upper air defended
him, Honoring Hector, granting him alone
The glory, though his day would soon be brief;
For Pallas Athena had already raised

The destined hour beneath the hands of Peleus' son.
Hector sought the place where men stood thickest,
And where the finest armor flashed; yet there
He could not break them. Joined as a tower,
Or as a cliff beside the gray sea, they waited Unmoved for all the shrieking roads of wind,
For waves that thundered on the rock. So stood The Danaans, holding Troy, and did not yield.
But Hector, bright with fire on every
side, Leaped into them as a wave falls on a ship,
A storm-wave lifted underneath the clouds
When wind drives hard; the ship is hidden under foam,
The sail roars, and the sailors tremble, carried But a short distance from the jaws of
death.
So in the Achaeans' breasts their hearts were broken.
As when a savage lion falls upon The cattle in a marsh, thousands grazing wide,
And the herdsman has not yet learned to fight The beast for the death of one horned ox—he walks Beside the first and last, but leaps
upon

The middle, and the whole herd recoils—so then
The Achaeans fled in terror before
Hector
And father Zeus.
Hector alone struck down Periphetes,
Mycenaean, beloved son of Copreus, Who once had served as herald, in the might
Of Heracles, before Eurystheus, king.
His son surpassed his father far in excellence,
In feet, in war, in judgment; foremost among Mycenae's men he had been shaped.
But then
He turned in flight, and stumbled on
the rim
Of the long shield he carried against the spears.
His feet were caught; he fell upon his
back;
The helmet rang around his temples.
Hector Saw him at once, ran near, and drove
his spear
Into his breast beside his grieving
friends.
They could not help him: Hector's terror held them.
The Argives drew inward; the first ships enclosed Them round, and Troy poured over them. They withdrew By force from those that stood in the foremost line, But stayed together near the huts; they did not

Scatter through the camp. Shame and fear restrained them; They called continually from man to
man.
Then Nestor, Gerenian guardian of
the Greeks, Kneeled and entreated each by his parents' names:
"Be men, dear friends, and set shame within your hearts."
"Remember the children, wives, and lands; remember
The fathers of the living and the dead,
Who lie beneath the earth. For their sake I kneel, Though they are not here. Stand fast, and hold your strength;
Do not turn your faces into fear." He spoke, and stirred the courage in their breasts.
Athena swept the wondrous mist
away
From both their eyes. A light arose on either side, Toward ships and battle, where the ranks met.
They saw bright Hector and his companions—those Who stood behind and would not fight, and those Who fought beside the swift ships.
Great-hearted Ajax
No longer found it pleasing to remain Where other Achaeans had withdrawn.
Across the long decks of the vessels he paced,

Taking great strides, and wielded in his hands
The sea-fighting spear, joined with rings of bronze,
Two-and-twenty cubits in its length.
As when a horseman skilled to guide his team Joins four together, driving from the plain Toward the city on the public road—many Men and women marvel as he leaps secure From one to another, while they fly beneath him—
So Ajax crossed the many ships, and strode Their long decks; his voice reached heaven. Without pause He shouted terribly, commanding all The Danaans to guard their ships and huts.
Nor Hector stayed within the close-packed press Of bronze-clad Trojans. As a shining eagle Falls on a flock of birds beside a river—Geese, cranes, or long-necked swans feeding in a meadow—So Hector sprang straight toward a dark-prowed ship.
Zeus drove him on with his tremendous hand,
And roused the people who advanced with him.
Again a sharp battle rose beside the
ships.
You would have thought that deathless, tireless men

Were meeting one another, such desire
For combat burned in them. The Achaean vowed They would not flee from evil, but would die;
Each Trojan heart hoped to burn the ships and kill
The Achaean heroes.
With this purpose they stood Against each other. Hector seized the stern
Of a seafaring ship, swift and beautiful,
The ship that carried Protesilaus to Troy
And never bore him home to his own land.
Around it Greeks and Trojans slaughtered men
At close quarters. They no longer kept apart For arrows or for spears, but stood nearby
With one mind, fighting with sharp axes, hatchets, Great swords, and double-edged spears. Many handsome, Black-hilted swords fell from the hands of men; Others slipped from shoulders; black earth ran with blood.
When Hector grasped the stern, he would not let it go.
Holding the curved stern-post in his
hands,
He called the Trojans: "Bring fire, and rise Together with one cry! Now Zeus has given

A day worth all our prayers—to take
the ships
That came against the gods' will, bringing us
So many sorrows through our elders' folly.
They held me back when I desired to
fight Beside the sterns, and held the people back.
But if wide-seeing Zeus then darkened our minds, He now himself commands us and drives us on."
He spoke; they rushed more fiercely on the Argives.
Ajax could no longer keep his place; the shafts Pressed hard around him. He withdrew a little,
Believing he would die there, he gave ground
Along the seven-foot bridge, and left The level timbers of the ship.
There he stood watching, and with
his spear Continually drove from the ships each Trojan Who bore the tireless fire. Always he shouted:
"Dear friends, Danaan heroes, servants of Ares,
Be men, my friends, remember furious strength!
Do we imagine helpers somewhere behind us, Or some stronger wall that might ward destruction off?
There is no city here with towers, where we might

Defend ourselves, holding another
people Behind our backs. We lie in Troy's open plain,
Close-packed in bronze, our faces toward the sea, Far from our fatherland. Our light is in Our own hands, not in any gentle kind of war.”
He spoke, and in his fury drove them back
With his keen spear. Each Trojan carrying fire Toward the hollow ships, encouraged by Hector's command, Ajax awaited
there
And struck him with his long spear.
Twelve he wounded
Before the ships, in close encounter.

Source range: Book 15. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 16

First-pass working translation

So they fought around the well-benched ship,
And Patroclus came before Achilles, The shepherd of the people, pouring tears Like a dark spring that spills its shadowed stream Down the face of a steep rock. When swift-footed Achilles saw him, pity touched his
heart:
“Why do you weep, Patroclus, like a girl
Who runs beside her mother, clutching at her robe, And holds her back though she is hastening on,
Looking up, and weeping till she is taken Into her arms? Do you bring news for us—
For the Myrmidons, or for me alone?
Have you heard word from Phthia?
They say that still Menoetius, Actor's son, and Peleus, Aeacus' son, live among the Myrmidons.
We should grieve bitterly if either died.
Or do you mourn the Argives, how they perish Beside the hollow ships through their own fault?
Speak out; do not hide it in your
heart,

That we may know the matter both
together.”
With a deep sigh Patroclus answered
him: “Achilles, son of Peleus, greatest far Among Achaeans, do not be angry
now;
Such grief has fallen upon the host.
The men Who once stood foremost lie beside
the ships,
Struck down or wounded. Diomedes is wounded, Tydeus' son; Odysseus of the spear,
And Agamemnon too; Eurypylus Has taken an arrow through the thigh. Physicians Rich in remedies labor over them, Healing their wounds; but you remain unmoved.
“May no such anger seize me—your own anger,
Which you preserve as though it were a virtue.
Who will be helped by you in aftertime, Though you were born of noble blood, if you refuse To turn this ruin from the Argives?
Hard man!
Your father was not horseman Peleus, nor Was Thetis your mother; gray sea and steep rocks Gave birth to you, for your mind is pitiless.
But if some prophecy troubles you, and your August mother has told you a word from Zeus,

Send me at least, and give me your Myrmidons,
That I may become a light to the Danaans.
Put your armor on my shoulders, so
the Trojans,
Taking me for you, may withdraw from war,
And the war-worn sons of Ares breathe again.
The respite would be small; and while we are fresh And they are weary, we could drive them back From ships and huts toward the city.”
So he pleaded, greatly foolish; for he asked
The evil death already marked for
him.
Swift-footed Achilles, troubled,
answered:
“Ah me, Patroclus, born of Zeus, what words Have passed your lips? I do not heed the prophecy
I know; nor has my mother brought me any word From Zeus. But this unbearable grief lies hard Upon my heart: when one who is my equal
Would take the prize from me, and rob me once again Of honor that was mine, though he has risen Beyond me in authority. That grief I carry, having endured it in my heart.

“The girl the sons of Achaeans chose my prize, Whom I won with my spear when I sacked the walls Of a strong city, Agamemnon took Back from my hands, as if I were a stranger Dishonored and without a name. Let what is past Lie quiet; it was not meant that I should rage Forever. I declared I would not cease My anger till the tumult and the
battle
Reached my own ships.
“Put my famous armor on your shoulders,
And lead the war-loving Myrmidons to war,
If the dark cloud of Troy has covered
all
The ships by force, while Argives pressed against The sea's edge possess but little ground,
And all the city has grown bold against them;
For they no longer see beside them shine
The front of my helmet. Fleeing, they would fill
The channels with their dead, if Agamemnon
Knew mercy now. But Tydeus' son no longer Wields the spear that warded death from Danaans;
Nor have I heard the son of Atreus call

From his detested head. Hector, killer of men, Shouts orders, and the Trojans hold the field, Overcoming Achaeans with their cry.
“Drive this ruin from the ships with all your force, Lest fire consume them and destroy our homeward Return. But hold this order in your
heart:
Win honor and great glory for me before
The Danaans, and bring the lovely girl
And shining gifts they will return to
me.
When you have driven them from the ships, come back.
And if the thunder-loving husband of Hera Grants you glory, do not wish to fight the Trojans Without me; you would lessen my renown.
Do not, rejoicing in the war and slaughter, Lead them toward Ilium, lest some deathless god Come down from high Olympus; far above all, Apollo loves that city. Turn back once
You have brought light to the ships, and leave them still To fight across the plain.”
If only Father Zeus, Athena, and Apollo

Would let no Trojan escape death—not one Of all who stand here—nor an Argive either,
And we two alone withdraw from ruin,
And loose Troy's sacred veils.
Ajax could hold no longer. The missiles pressed Him hard; the will of Zeus and splendid Troy Wore down his strength. His bright and terrible helm Rang round his temples under blows that struck Its well-made bosses. His left shoulder ached, Yet still he held the shining shield
before him;
They could not stagger him by leaning spears Against it. Breath came painfully; sweat poured
From every limb; one evil followed
on Another, and no place remained for breath.
Tell me now, Muses of Olympian
halls,
How first the fire fell on Achaean
ships.
Hector stood near him, struck his ashen spear Behind the blade, where bronze met wood, and cut It through. Ajax held the useless stump;
The bronze point fell far from him and rang

Upon the ground. He knew within his blameless heart
The gods' work, and shuddered:
Zeus, the thunderer, Was cutting off the counsel of the
fight,
Desiring victory for Troy. Ajax Withdrew beneath the missiles. Then
the Trojans
Cast tireless fire upon the swift ship; At once the flame ran over stern and timbers.
Achilles struck his thighs and called aloud:
"Rise, Patroclus, born of Zeus, driver
of horses!
I see beside the ships the cry and breath
Of hostile fire. Let them not take the vessels,
And leave us no retreat. Put on the
armor
With speed; I will assemble all the people."
He spoke. Patroclus clothed himself in bronze.
First he set beautiful greaves about His legs, and clasped them at the ankles with Bright silver fastenings. Then he drew the starry,
Many-colored corselet of Aeacides Across his breast; around his shoulders hung
The bronze sword, hilted in shining silver,
And then the great, strong shield.
Upon his head
He set the well-made helmet, horse-haired;

Above it nodded the dread crest. He took Two stout spears that fitted to his
hands.
But not the spear of blameless Aeacides—Heavy, immense, and massive, which no other Achaean could brandish. Only
Achilles
Knew how to wield the Pelian ash that Chiron
Had given Peleus, for the death of heroes.
Achilles ordered Automedon to yoke The horses, whom he honored most
beside Himself, the faithful one who stood with him
Within the battle's shout.
Automedon
Brought Xanthus and Balius beneath the yoke, Swift horses flying on the breath of wind.
Podarge, the Harpy, bore them to the West Wind
As she grazed beside the stream of Ocean.
Beside the trace he set blameless Pedasus,
Whom Achilles had taken when he sacked Eetion's city. Mortal though he was,
The horse kept pace with horses born immortal.
Achilles went among the huts and armed
The Myrmidons. They rushed like flesh-eating wolves,

Whose hearts hold measureless strength after they tear Apart a great-antlered stag upon the hills.
Their cheeks are red with blood; in a pack they go Down to a black-water spring, and lap the dark Water with thin tongues, belching out the clot
Of blood. Their courage has no fear
within;
Their bellies swell with strength of what they killed.
So captains and commanders moved
around
The brave companion of swift-footed Peleus' son;
Among them stood Achilles, urging
horses
And men behind their shields.
Fifty swift ships belonged to him, whom Zeus Loved, and bore him toward Troy. In each were fifty Companions at the oars. Five leaders he had set Whom he trusted to give commands; he himself
Held the great mastery over all.
Menesthius, flashing bronze, led the
first;
The son of Spercheius, heaven's river.
Fair
Polydora, Peleus' daughter, bore him To the tireless stream after lying with
The god; but Borus, son of Perieres, Was called his father, for he openly married

Her and gave bride-price beyond measure.
Eudorus, warlike and unmarried, led The second. Lovely Polymele, daughter
Of Phylas, bore him after Hermes saw
Her among Artemis' bright dancers, loved
Her eyes, and climbed in secret to her room.
He gave her Eudorus, glorious son, Swift-footed, excellent in war. When Eileithyia, Goddess of birth, brought him into the light
To see the sun, Echeclus, Actor's son, Took the child's mother to his house, and gave Countless bride-gifts; but old Phylas reared
The child, and loved him as he were his own.
Peisander, son of Maemalus, led The third, and all the Myrmidons surpassed In spear-fight beside Peleus' son. The fourth Was old Phoenix, driver of horses; fifth,
Blameless Alcimedon, Laerces' son.
When Achilles had arrayed them with their leaders, He gave a stern command: "Let none forget
The threats you uttered at the swift ships once, While anger held me, and each one accused me:

‘Cruel son of Peleus, your mother nourished
You in gall; pitiless, you keep us here Against our will beside the ships. Let us Return across the sea, since such a bitter Anger has entered your heart.’ You often spoke Those words when you gathered around me. Now
The great work of the war you once desired
Stands plain before you. Let each man who carries A valiant heart go fight the Trojans.” He stirred the spirit in them; at his words
The ranks drew close. As when a builder lays A wall with stones close-fitted, to hold back
The violent winds from a high-roofed house,
So shield leaned against shield, helmet against Helmet, and man against his fellow
man; Horsehair crests touched with bright ridges as they stood.
Before them Patroclus and Automedon,
Of one accord, armed themselves to lead the host.
Achilles rose and entered his hut.
From a chest
He took the beautiful cup Thetis had set
There, silver-footed, when she brought it aboard,

With shirts, wind-sheltering cloaks, and woven rugs.
No other man had drunk burning wine from it, Nor had Achilles poured a god a libation
From that cup, save to Father Zeus.
He took
It from the chest, cleansed it first with sulfur,
Then washed it in pure streams, and washed his hands.
He drew the dark wine, stood amid the yard,
And poured it, looking upward toward the sky.
Zeus, who delights in thunder, did not fail
To hear him: “Lord Zeus of Dodona, Pelasgian, dwelling Far off, guardian of stormy Dodona, Where Selloi, your interpreters, live round you, Unwashed of foot, and sleep upon
the ground—
Once you heard my prayer, and honored me, Humbling the Achaean people greatly;
Grant me this prayer also. I remain here Beside the ships, but send my companion out
To fight among the many Myrmidons.
Send glory with him, wide-seeing Zeus, and make His heart courageous, that Hector may know

Whether my friend alone has learned to fight,
Or whether his hands rage invincibly only When I enter the tumult of Ares.
When he has driven the war-cry
from the ships,
Let him return unharmed to me, with all His armor and his close-fighting companions.”
So prayed Achilles; and the counselor heard.
The father granted one half, denied the other:
Patroclus would drive battle from
the ships,
But would not come safe home from that battle.
When he had poured the offering and prayed to Zeus, Achilles went inside and set the cup Within the chest; then came and stood before His hut, still longing in his heart to see
The terrible encounter of the Trojans
And Achaeans.
The men, in arms together with Patroclus,
Marched forth; and, bold within their hearts, they fell Upon the Trojans. At once they poured like wasps Beside a road, whom foolish children tease, Delighting in their sport, while the insects keep

Their homes beside the path, making one evil
For many. If a traveler passing near Disturbs them without meaning, all at once
The strong-hearted wasps fly forward to defend Their young. So from the ships the Myrmidons
Streamed forth, and an unquenchable cry rose.
Patroclus lifted up his voice:
“Companions
Of Peleus' son Achilles, be men,
friends,
And remember your furious strength, that we may Honor the son of Peleus, best by far Among the Argives here, and his companions,
The best in close combat. Let Agamemnon,
Son of Atreus, learn his blindness—he honored Not the best of the Achaeans.” Thus he stirred
The courage of them all. Together they fell Upon the Trojans, and the ships around them Rang terribly beneath the Achaean shout.
When the Trojans saw Menoetius' brave son, Himself and his companion shining in the armor, Every heart shook, and every rank was moved.
They hoped that swift-footed Peleus'
son

Had laid his anger by the ships and chosen Friendship once more; each looked for some escape From steep and sudden death.
Patroclus first cast his shining spear Into the densest crowd, beside the stern
Of great Protesilaus' ship. He struck Pyraechmes, leader of the horse-armored Paeons, Who came from broad Amydon beside the Axios.
The spear drove through his right shoulder; backward
He fell into the dust with a groan.
His people Scattered around him, for Patroclus cast Fear among them by killing their first fighter.
He drove them from the ships and quenched the fire.
The half-burned ship remained; the Trojans fled
With a god's tumult, and Danaans poured Among the hollow vessels. An uproar rose
That would not cease.
As Zeus, the gatherer of lightning, drives
A heavy cloud from a mountain's high peak,
And watchtowers, ridges, valleys all appear While heaven opens into boundless sky,
So Danaans, having driven the hostile fire

From the ships, drew breath a little.
Yet the war Gave them no rest. The Trojans did not flee Headlong from the black ships before the Achaeans, But still resisted, yielding them only Under compulsion.
When the battle-line broke, man took his man.
First Menoetius' son, as Areilycus Turned, struck his thigh with the sharp spear; bronze Passed through, and shattered bone.
Face downward
Areilycus fell. Menelaus struck Thoas in the bare chest beside his
shield,
And loosed his limbs. Meges watched Amphiclus Rush toward him, and struck the upper leg,
Where muscle is thickest in a man's body;
The point split sinew, and darkness covered him.
Antilochus, Nestor's son, struck Atymnius
Within the flank; the bronze passed through, and he fell.
Maris stood beside his brother's body,
And sprang at Antilochus in rage.
But godlike Thrasymedes thrust before he could strike,
And pierced his shoulder; the spear severed muscle, Passed through the bone, and Maris fell with a crash.

Darkness covered his eyes. Thus the two friends
Of Sarpedon, the spear-fighting sons Of Amisodarus, went down to Erebus—
The man who raised the unconquerable Chimera,
A great evil for many.
Ajax, Oileus' son, sprang upon Cleobulus, Still living, stunned among the confusion.
He struck his neck with the sword's hilt and loosed His strength; the blade grew warm with blood, and death And the strong portion of fate seized his eyes.
Peneleus and Lycon rushed together; Their spears went wide, and each cast his shaft in vain.
Then they met again with swords.
Lycon struck
The boss of Peneleus' horse-haired helmet,
But his sword broke around the shaft. Peneleus Cut Lycon's neck beneath the ear; the blade Went through, and only skin held on the head
While all the limbs gave way.
Meriones, running swiftly, caught Acamas
As he climbed to his horses, and struck his shoulder.
He fell from the chariot; mist covered his eyes.
Idomeneus struck Erymas in the mouth

With pitiless bronze. The spear passed beneath
The brain, shattering the white bones; teeth sprang out, Both eyes filled with blood, and blood broke from His mouth and nostrils. Black death covered him.
So each Danaan leader took a man, as wolves Fall on lambs or kids when scattered mountain flocks Have lost their shepherd—snatching them away.
And when the wolves have seen them, quickly tear
The helpless lambs apart. So Danaans fell Upon the Trojans; but the Trojans remembered
The loud terror of flight, and lost the furious Strength that had been theirs.
Great Ajax still hurled himself against Hector in bronze. But Hector, practiced in war, Covered his broad shoulders with a bull's hide,
And watched the whistling arrows and the spears That struck with weight. He knew well that victory Had turned toward the other side, yet still remained,
And saved his steadfast companions.
As when a cloud comes down from bright Olympus Into the clear air, when Zeus stretches out

The storm, so from the ships rose shout and terror.
They did not draw back in an ordered way.
Swift horses carried Hector with his
armor;
He left the Trojan people in the trench,
Held there unwillingly. Many swift
horses,
Dragging their chariots, broke their yokes within it,
And left their lords' vehicles behind.
Patroclus followed, shouting, calling
out
To Danaans, filled with evil thoughts for Troy.
The roads were full of their cry and fear; the whirlwind Scattered high beneath the clouds, and one-hoofed horses Stretched themselves toward the city, running back From ships and huts. Wherever he could see
The greatest multitude in confusion,
there
He drove them with his cry. Beneath the axles Men fell face-first from chariots; overturned,
The cars lay broken. Deathless horses, gifts
The gods had given Peleus, leaped
the trench.
Hector's heart desired to cast at Patroclus,
But swift horses bore him out of reach.

As when in autumn rain the black earth grows Heavy, when Zeus pours down his fiercest storm
In anger at men who in the assembly judge Crooked judgments by force and drive out justice, Heeding no god's regard—then all the rivers Rise as they run, and ravines cut the hills,
Roaring from mountains toward the purple sea, While the works of men grow small—so Trojan horses Raced and groaned beneath their harness.
When Patroclus had broken through the first ranks,
He drove them back toward ships.
He did not let them Reach the city, but between the ships, the river, And the high wall he leaped upon and killed, Exactng the price of many. First he struck Pronous with his shining spear in the bare chest Beside the shield, and loosed his limbs; he fell With a crash. Then he rushed upon Thestor, Enops' son, who crouched within his polished car, His wits struck senseless; reins had fled his hands.
Patroclus stood beside him, drove
the spear

Through his right jaw and teeth, and drawing him Above the rim, pulled him from the
chariot—
As a fisherman upon a jutting rock Draws a holy fish from the sea with line
And glittering bronze. So he drew Thestor out, Mouth gaping on the spear, and thrust him down Upon his face; the life departed him.
Then Erylaus came rushing; with a stone
He struck the middle of his head.
The skull Split under the heavy helmet, and he fell Face downward; death poured round him. After him
He sent Erymas, Amphoteron, Epaltus, Tlepolemus son of Damastor, Echius, Pyris, Ipheus, Euippus, and Polymelus, Argeas' son—all in succession brought
Down to the nourishing earth.
When Sarpedon saw his companions
fall,
Their tunics stripped of armor, beneath the hands
Of Menoetius' son, he called the Lycians:
“Shame, Lycians! Where do you flee?
Be swift!
I will myself meet this man, and learn who he is,
Who holds such power and has done so much harm

To Troy, unbinding the knees of many brave men.”
He leaped from his chariot with his
armor;
Patroclus, seeing him, sprang down from his own.
They rushed together, crying out, like two Curved-clawed vultures fighting on a high rock,
Their cry enormous and terrible.
The son of crooked-counseling Cronus saw them,
And pitied Sarpedon, dearest of all
men
To him. He spoke to Hera, sister and wife: “Ah me! Fate has appointed that Sarpedon,
Dearest of men to me, be overcome By Menoetius' son. My heart divides me
As I deliberate: shall I seize him living
From this tearful battle, set him down in rich Lycia—or let him fall beneath the
hands
Of Menoetius' son?”
Ox-eyed Hera answered: “Most terrible son of Cronus, what have you said?
Would you free from death a mortal long ago Appointed by his fate? Do so; but know
The other gods will not approve.
Hold this Within your heart: if you send your beloved son

Alive from battle, every god may wish To send his own dear son away.
Many sons
Of immortals fight before Priam's city;
You would awaken dreadful envy in them all.
But if he is dear, and your heart laments him, Let him be overcome by Menoetius' son.
When breath and life have left him, send Death and Sleep To bear him to the people of broad Lycia.
There brothers and companions will prepare His burial, with mound and pillar; that is The honor given the dead.”
She spoke; the father of gods and men did not Refuse. He poured red drops upon the earth, Honoring his dear son, whom Patroclus Was destined to kill in fertile Troy, Far from his fatherland.
When the two were near, Patroclus struck Thrasymelus, Sarpedon's excellent friend, Low in the belly; he loosed his limbs. Sarpedon Cast his bright spear again, but missed, and struck Pedasus, the horse, upon the right shoulder.

The horse cried out as life went from him, fell Into the dust, and his spirit flew away.
The other horses sprang apart; the yoke broke,
The reins were tangled when the side horse lay.
Automedon, famous for his spear, found the cure.
He drew the long sword thick upon his thigh, Sprang forward, and cut away the side horse.
The other two straightened; the reins pulled taut.
Once more the heroes met above the battle That eats the heart. Again Sarpedon missed;
The point passed over Patroclus' left shoulder.
Then Patroclus rose behind his bronze, and cast No vain spear: he struck Sarpedon where the midriff Encloses the inward heart. He fell as falls An oak, a poplar, or a tall pine that men Cut on the mountain with their sharpened axes, Preparing it to be a ship's timber.
So he lay before his horses and his car, Roaring, and clutching dust turned red with blood.
As a lion kills a great-horned bull among

The herd, the bull bellowing beneath its jaws,
So the shield-bearing lord of Lycia, dying Beneath Patroclus, struggled and called his friend: “Glaucus, dear friend, now you must be a spearman,
A bold fighter among men, if you are swift.
Let this evil battle be your desire.
Go first among the Lycian leaders, urge them
To fight around Sarpedon; then fight for me Yourself with bronze. I shall be shame and reproach
To you each day if Achaeans strip my
armor
When I fall among the ships. Stand fast, and rouse
The people.”
When he had spoken, death covered
his eyes
And nostrils. Patroclus set his foot upon
His chest and drew the spear from out his body;
With it the point came forth, the midriff and
The spirit following. Then he drew
the spear
From flesh. At once the Myrmidons held back
The horses, snorting, eager to escape, Their masters' chariot left behind.
When Glaucus heard the cry, a dreadful grief Came over him; his heart was shaken, though

He could not yet give help. He pressed his arm,
For a wound tormented him—the wound Teucer Had given him before the high-built
wall, Defending his friends from destruction. He prayed: “Hear me, lord, whether in rich Lycia Or Troy; you hear the man in trouble everywhere.
I bear this wound; sharp pains run through my arm,
The blood will not dry, and my shoulder grows heavy.
I cannot hold my spear, nor go against
The enemy. The best of men has fallen, Sarpedon, Zeus's son; yet Zeus himself
Defends him not. But you, lord, heal this wound,
Quiet the pain, and give me strength,
that I May call the Lycians, urge them on,
and fight Myself around the dead.” He prayed; Apollo heard. At once he stilled
The pain, dried black blood from the wound,
And poured strength into Glaucus' heart. He knew
The god had heard him, and rejoiced.
First he went among the Lycian
leaders,
Urging them to fight around Sarpedon; then

With long strides sought Polydamas and Agenor, And came beside Aeneas and bronze-clad Hector: “Hector, you have forgotten the allies Who waste their lives, far from their friends and land,
For you, while you do not come to their aid.
Sarpedon lies here, leader of the shields
Of Lycia, who ruled his land by judgment, Strength, and the spear. Bronze Ares, under Patroclus, has overcome him. Come,
dear friends,
Stand by us; let your hearts be shamed. Do not let The Myrmidons strip off his armor, dishonor
The dead, for all the Danaans we killed
Beside the ships.”
He spoke; an unbearable grief seized
Troy,
For Sarpedon had been the city's support, Though foreign there, and many
followed him.
They went against the Danaans, eager for war;
Hector led them, enraged for Sarpedon.
But Patroclus' shaggy heart aroused The Achaeans. He spoke to both the Ajaxes:
“Ajaxes, let it be dear to you to guard us

As you have done before—or better still.
Here lies the man who first leaped on our wall, Sarpedon. If we could seize and dishonor him, Strip off his armor, kill one of those who guard
The dead with pitiless bronze!”
They desired to drive the danger off.
Trojans and Lycians, Myrmidons and Greeks
Strengthened their ranks and joined with dreadful cries Around the dead; the armor rang aloud.
Zeus stretched hateful night across
the fight,
That war's hard labor might surround his son.
The Trojans drove the bright-eyed Achaeans back;
Epigeus had been struck, not least
among
The Myrmidons, Agacles' godlike
son.
Once he ruled Budeion; but after killing His noble cousin fled to Peleus and Silver-footed Thetis, who sent him
out
With Achilles to horse-rich Ilium.
As Epigeus touched the dead, bright Hector struck
His head with a stone; his skull split within
The heavy helm; face downward on the corpse
He fell, and death poured round him.

Patroclus grieved, and sprang through the foremost Fighters like a hawk that scatters jackdaws.
So upon Lycians and Trojans you rushed, Angered for your companion. With a stone
You struck Sthenelaus, Ithaemenes'
son,
Upon the neck and shattered the tendons.
The foremost fighters and bright Hector gave ground, As far as a long javelin reaches when a man Tests it in war; so far the Trojans fled.
Glaucus, first among shield-bearing Lycians,
Turned and killed great-hearted Bathycles, Chalcon's beloved son, a wealthy
man
Among the Myrmidons. Bathycles caught Him in pursuit; Glaucus turned suddenly,
And struck the middle of his chest.
He fell.
Greeks grieved; Trojans rejoiced around him.
Yet Achaeans remembered strength, and carried
Their courage straight against the enemy.
Meriones took Laogonus, brave son Of Onetor, priest of Idaean Zeus, Honored among his people as a god.

He struck beneath the jaw and ear; life swiftly Left his limbs, and hateful darkness took him.
Aeneas cast his bronze spear at Meriones,
But Meriones saw it and bent away.
The long spear planted itself behind
him,
Its butt-end quivering in the earth.
There Ares Robbed it of force; it sank, having leaped Vainly from Aeneas' hand. Aeneas said:
"Though you are a dancer, my spear would have stilled You had it found you." Meriones replied:
"Though you are strong, you cannot quench the spirit Of every man who comes against you. You too Are mortal. If sharp bronze struck you, though you Trust in your strength, you would give glory and life To Hades of the famous horses." Menoetius' son rebuked him: "Why speak such things?
The Trojans will not leave the dead for taunts;
The earth will hold one of us first.
War's end Lies in the hands; words belong to counsel.
We must fight." He led; Meriones
followed.
The sound of woodcutters rose in mountain valleys;

So from the earth rose crash of bronze and hide,
Of shields and double-edged swords striking spears.
No man, however wise, could know divine Sarpedon now; arrows, blood, and dust concealed him.
The fighters crowded round the dead as flies Buzz around full milk-pails in spring, the vessels wet.
Nor did Zeus turn his shining eyes
away.
He watched and pondered Patroclus'
death:
Should Hector kill him beside Sarpedon, strip
The armor from his shoulders—or heap still more Grievous labor on the many? This seemed best:
That Patroclus drive the Trojans and bronze-clad Hector back to Troy, and take the lives of many.
First he put cowardice into Hector's
heart.
Hector climbed his chariot and turned to flee, Calling the Trojans; for he knew Zeus's balance.
Nor did the Lycians stay. Fear seized them all
When they saw their king among the dead,
His heart struck through. Many had fallen on him When Cronus' son drew out the fierce quarrel.

They took the bronze armor from Sarpedon; then
Menoetius' son sent it to his friends To carry to the hollow ships. Zeus spoke to Apollo:
“Go, dear Phoebus, cleanse the dark blood from him; Lift Sarpedon from the arrows, carry
him,
And wash him in the river's streams.
Anoint him With ambrosia, clothe him in immortal garments.
Then send him with swift guides, Sleep and Death,
Twin brothers, who will set him down in Lycia, Rich land of broad peoples. There his brothers
And friends shall prepare the body, with mound
And pillar; that is honor for the dead.”
Apollo did not disobey. Down from Ida
He went into the dreadful battle, lifted Sarpedon from the arrows, carried him far, Washed him, anointed him, and clothed him in Immortal garments. Then he sent him with The twins, Sleep and Death, who swiftly set him down In broad Lycia.
But Patroclus ordered horses and Automedon,
And chased the Trojans and Lycians, deluded.

Had he kept Peleus' son's command, he would Have escaped black death. But Zeus's will is stronger Than the will of men: it frightens even the brave, Takes victory away with ease, then gives
The courage back to fight.
Whom did you first kill, Patroclus, and whom last,
When gods called you to death?
Adrestus first,
Autonous, Echeclus, Perimus, Megas'
son, Epistor, Melanippus; then Elasmus, Mulijs, Pylartes—these you took, while all
The others turned and fled.
The Achaeans would have taken steep-gated Troy Under Patroclus' hands, so fiercely he raged,
If Phoebus had not stood upon the
wall,
Planning his death and aiding Troy.
Three times Patroclus climbed the high wall at the corner;
Three times Apollo thrust him back, touching
His shining shield with immortal
hands.
When Patroclus, godlike, rushed the
wall
A fourth time, Apollo cried in winged wrath: “Draw back, Patroclus, born of Zeus.
It is not

Your portion to sack Troy with your
spear—
Nor even Achilles', better far than
you.”
He spoke; Patroclus drew far back, avoiding
The Far-Shooter's anger.
Hector held his one-hoofed horses at The Scaean Gate, and wondered whether he should Drive once more into the battle's
heart,
Or call the people back within the wall.
As he considered, Phoebus came beside him
In the likeness of a strong young man, Asius, Hector's mother's brother, Hecabe's full Brother, Dymas' son, who dwelt in Phrygia Beside the streams of Sangarius. In his shape
The son of Zeus spoke: “Hector, why have you ceased From battle? It is not fitting. Would
that I Were weaker than you by as much as I might be Stronger; then I would soon make you turn away From hateful war. Drive your strong-hoofed horses now Against Patroclus. Perhaps you may seize him,
And Apollo grant you glory.” He spoke; the god returned among the labor

Of mankind. Hector ordered wise
Cebriones
To lash the horses into battle. Apollo entered
The multitude and threw confusion
on
The Argives, giving glory to the
Trojans
And Hector. Hector left the others, did not Strip armor, but drove straight at Patroclus.
From the other side Patroclus leaped
down, Holding his spear in his left hand; in the right
He took a sharp and glittering stone, large enough To cover it, and hurled it without delay.
The cast was not in vain: he struck Cebriones,
Priam's renowned bastard, who held the reins, Between the brows. The stone crushed both eyebrows; Bone could not hold, and eyes fell in the dust
Before his feet. Like a diver he fell out
Of the well-made chariot; life left his bones.
Patroclus mocked him: "How lightly he has leaped!
He turns a neat somersault. If only
he Were somewhere in the fish-filled sea, this man Could fill a hungry belly, diving from a ship

For oysters, though the sea were rough. So lightly
He tumbles now upon the plain.
There are divers
Among the Trojans too." So he sprang upon Cebriones like a lion Ravaging a fold, wounded in the chest, Whose courage ruins it. Hector leaped from The horses on the other side. The two fought round Cebriones like lions on a mountain summit, Hungry, high in spirit, fighting over a deer—Patroclus, Menoetius' son, and radiant Hector, Masters of the war-cry, rushing to cut flesh With pitiless bronze. Hector seized the head
And would not let it go; Patroclus held
The foot. Trojans and Danaans joined the fight,
And the war grew strong.
As East Wind and South Wind strive in mountain valleys, Shaking the deep oak, ash, and smooth-barked cornel, When long branches strike with terrible sound
And broken boughs crash, so Trojans and Achaeans,
Leaping upon each other,
slaughtered men,
And neither thought of ruinous fear.
Spears

And feathered arrows sprang from bowstrings, fixed Around Cebriones; great stones battered shields.
He lay immense within the whirl of
dust,
Forgetful of his horsemanship.
While the sun stood high at heaven's middle,
The weapons of both sides reached their marks and men Fell. But when the sun turned toward the hour Of unyoking, then beyond what fate allowed The Achaeans grew stronger. They dragged Cebriones Away from weapons and Trojans, stripped the armor
From his shoulders.
Patroclus rushed upon the Trojans, Evil in heart. Three times he sprang among them,
Like swift Ares, shouting terribly;
three times
Nine men he killed. But when he rushed a fourth time, Equal to a god, the end of life appeared.
Phoebus came against him in the fierce battle, Wrapped in thick mist, unseen. He stood behind
And struck his broad back with the flat of his hand; Patroclus' eyes spun round. Apollo knocked
The helmet from his head; it rolled beneath

The horses' feet with ringing sound, its horsehair Stained by blood and dust. Until that hour the helm Had not been fated to be fouled, for it guarded
The head and fair brow of godlike
Achilles.
But now Zeus gave it Hector, though the day
Of his destruction was already near.
The long-shadowed spear was shattered in Patroclus' Hands, heavy, great, and crested;
from his shoulders
The shield fell by its strap onto the earth.
Apollo loosened the corselet from
him.
Delusion took his mind; his shining limbs
Grew slack. He stood stunned.
Behind, between his shoulders, A Dardanian struck him with a sharp
spear—Euphorbus, Panthous' son, who surpassed his age In spearmanship, horsemanship, and running feet.
He had first come with chariot and brought down Twenty men while learning war. He was the first To cast at you, Patroclus, but could not master you.
He ran back into the crowd, drawing the ash Spear from your flesh; he did not stand to face you, Though you were naked in the battle.

Patroclus, struck by god and spear, withdrew
Among companions, fleeing his appointed death.
When Hector saw him draw back, wounded by bronze,
He came through the ranks and struck him in the belly; The bronze passed through.
Patroclus fell with a crash,
And deep grief seized Achaeans.
As when a lion overcomes an unwearied boar,
And both, high in the mountains,
fight beside
A little spring, each thirsting to drink, till force
At last subdues the panting boar—so
Hector,
Priam's son, near his spear, took life
away From brave Patroclus, who had killed so many,
And spoke in triumph: “Patroclus, surely you said you would lay waste
Our city, take the free day from Trojan women,
And carry them by ship to your dear fatherland—
Fool! Before them Hector's swift horses have Stretched their feet to battle. I excel with spear
Among the Trojans who defend their day;
But vultures will devour you here.
Poor man, Achilles did not help you, though he gave you

Many commands: ‘Do not return to hollow ships,
Driver of horses, until you strip the bloody Tunic from the breast of man-killing
Hector.’
So he spoke, I think, and your foolish mind obeyed.”
With failing strength Patroclus
answered him:
“Boast now, Hector. Zeus, Cronus' son, and Apollo Gave you victory; they easily subdued me,
And stripped the armor from my shoulders. If twenty Men like you had met me, all would have perished Here beneath my spear. But deadly fate and Leto's Son have killed me, and among men Euphorbus;
You are the third to strip me. Hear this and hold It in your heart: you shall not live long. Death And mighty fate stand near; you shall fall beneath
The hands of blameless Achilles, Aeacus' son.”
He spoke; death covered eyes and nostrils. His spirit Flew from his limbs and went to Hades, lamenting Its fate, leaving its manhood and its youth.
Even dead, bright Hector answered: “Why prophesy
My steep destruction, Patroclus?
Who can know

If Achilles, fair-haired Thetis' son, will not
First be struck beneath my spear and lose his life?"
He spoke, set foot upon him, drew the bronze
Spear from the wound, and thrust him from it backward.
Then after Automedon he went with
spear,
The godlike friend of swift-footed Aeacides,
Desiring to strike him; but immortal
horses, Beautiful gifts the gods had given to Peleus,
Carried Automedon away.

Source range: Book 16. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Patroclus enters battle in borrowed armor

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's Blake-informed visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.

BOOK 17

First-pass working translation

Nor did Patroclus' fall escape
Menelaus,
Atreus' son, dear to the war-god.
Through
The foremost fighters in his flashing bronze
He went, and circled round Patroclus as A cow circles her first-born calf, lowing, Unskilled in birth. So golden-haired
Menelaus
Moved round the body, holding spear and shield Before him in all directions, eager to kill Whoever came against him.
Nor did Panthous' son, skilled with the ash spear, Neglect Patroclus when he fell. He stood Near him and spoke to war-loving
Menelaus:
"Son of Atreus, nourished by Zeus, leader, Draw back; leave the corpse and let the spoils be mine.
No Trojan or renowned ally first struck him With spear in the bitter battle. Let me win Good glory among Troy's men; I might strike you,
And take the sweet breath from your life."

Golden-haired Menelaus answered angrily:
"Father Zeus, it is not good for any
man
To boast so fiercely. Neither leopard, lion,
Nor boar whose heart swells with great strength has such A spirit as the sons of Panthous, skilled
With spears. Nor did the strength of horse-taming Hyperenor profit him, when, glorying
In youth, he called me weakest of Danaans.
He never thought his feet would carry him home To gladden wife and parents. So I too
Will break your courage if you stand before me.
Go back among the crowd; do not stand against me Until you learn what harm a fool may learn too late."
But Euphorbus would not yield:
"Now, Menelaus, Son of Zeus, you shall pay for the kinsman slain.
You made his wife a widow in her chamber,
And brought deep mourning to his father and mother.
Would I could comfort those poor mourners, carrying Your head and armor to Panthous and godlike Phrontis! Yet the labor will not wait long

Untried; courage and fear must meet their trial.”

He struck Menelaus' shield on every
side;

The bronze could not pierce it, and the point bent

Within the strong shield. Atreus' son rose

Behind his bronze and prayed to Father Zeus.

When Euphorbus drew back, he thrust beneath

The belly, leaning his full weight
upon

The spear; the point passed through the tender neck.

Euphorbus fell with a crash; his armor rang.

His hair, like the Graces', braided locks bound up

With gold and silver, was drenched in blood.

As a man raises a young and flourishing olive

Where water runs abundantly, newly green,

Shaken by every wind and white with flower,

Until a violent storm tears it from the trench

And lays it stretched upon the earth, so fell

Euphorbus beneath Menelaus' spear; And Menelaus stripped his shining
armor.

As when a mountain lion, trusting in his strength,

Seizes the finest bull from a grazing
herd,

First breaking its neck, then swallowing blood

And inward parts, while distant dogs and herdsmen

Cry out but dare not come, for green fear holds them,

So no Trojan found courage in his breast

To stand before glorious Menelaus.

He would have carried off the famous armor

Of Panthous' son, if Phoebus had not grown

Angry with him. Apollo roused up
Hector,

Like swift Ares, in the form and voice of Menthēs,

Leader of Cicones, and spoke to
Hector:

“Hector, you chase the horses of Aeacides;

They are hard for mortal men to master—none

But Achilles can control them, he whom bore

His deathless mother. Meanwhile warlike Atreus'

Son has straddled Patroclus and has killed

The best of Trojans, Euphorbus, Panthous' son.

Come now, drive against him; perhaps Apollo

Will grant you glory.”

So the god returned

Among the labor of mankind. Dark grief

Enclosed the heart of Hector.

Through the ranks

He looked, and saw one man carrying away
The armor, and another lying in
blood.
Hector went through the foremost fighters in His shining bronze, crying sharply, like a fire
Of Hephaestus that no one can put
out.
Menelaus heard the keen cry, and
spoke Within his troubled heart: "If I abandon
The armor and Patroclus, who lies here
Because of me, will any Danaan seeing me Be angry? Yet if alone I fight with Hector,
Lest many surround me—Hector leads them all—
What profit is there in these words?
Whenever
A man fights a godlike warrior whom a god Honors, great sorrow soon rolls over
him.
No Danaan who sees me go against
Hector
Will blame me, since a god sustains his fight.
If only I could hear great Ajax' cry!
Then we two might return and keep our courage, Even against a god, and draw away
the dead."
He weighed the matter in his heart, but then

The Trojan ranks came on, with Hector leading.
Menelaus drew back from the corpse, turning Again and again, like a long-maned lion Whom dogs and men drive from a fold with spears
And shouts; his brave heart chills within him, and Against his will he leaves the yard. So
Menelaus
Went from Patroclus, then turned and stood among His friends, looking for great Telamonian Ajax.
At once he saw him on the left of
battle,
Giving his companions heart and urging them To fight; Apollo had cast a wondrous
fear Among them. Menelaus ran and
stood Near him: "Ajax, dear friend, let us hurry now
For dead Patroclus, and, if possible, Bring him without his armor back to Achilles.
But Hector has his shining armor." He spoke and stirred The warlike heart of Ajax. Through the foremost Fighters Ajax went, and golden-haired Menelaus followed. Hector, after stripping Patroclus of the famous armor, dragged the corpse,

Desiring with sharp bronze to cut his head off
And give the body to the Trojan women
And dogs. But Ajax came near, his shield spread out Like a tower. Hector drew back among his friends, Leaped into his chariot, and gave the
armor
To Trojans, who carried it toward
the city,
A great glory for him.
Ajax spread his broad shield around Menoetius'
Son, and stood above him like a lion Above its cubs, when hunters meet it in
The forest as it leads its little ones; The lion swells with strength and draws its brow Down over both its eyes. So Ajax
stood Around Patroclus. On the other side Menelaus stood, enlarging sorrow in
him.
Glaucus, Hippolochus' son, leader of The Lycians, looked Hector darkly in the face And spoke hard words: "Hector, your appearance shines,
But in the battle you have proved deficient;
You have an empty name, though you are one Who flees. Consider how you may now save
The city and its people, you alone With those born in Ilium. No Lycian will

Go forth and fight the Danaans
around
The city; there is no gratitude in fighting Without end. How could you save a lesser man Among the multitude, pitiless one, When you have left Sarpedon, guest-friend and ally,
To be a spoil and prize for Argives?
He
Was great support to you and to the city While living, but you did not dare to keep
The dogs from him. If any Lycian will obey,
Let us go home; ruin without remedy Has come to Troy. If Trojans had the courage
That enters men who set their fatherland
Before their labor and their lives, we might Drag Patroclus into Ilium. If this dead Man came to Priam's city and we dragged him
From the battle, the Argives would strip the beautiful Armor from Sarpedon and carry him Into Ilium; his companion has fallen, The best of Argives by the ships, whose friends Were best in close combat. Yet you did not dare To stand before great Ajax, meet his eyes
Amid the cry, or fight him straight, for he Is stronger than you.” Shining-helmeted Hector answered:

“Glaucus,
Why speak such an over-bold word? I thought
You greater in mind than all rich Lycia's men;
Now I despise your judgment, saying
I
Would not stand against monstrous Ajax. I do not Fear battle or the thunder of horses; But Zeus's will is stronger than the brave,
Putting them to flight, or urging them to fight.
Come, dear friend, stand beside me and watch the deed: Shall I be weak all day, as you have
said,
Or hold some Danaan back, however eager,
From guarding Patroclus, who has died?”
He called aloud: “Trojans, Lycians, Dardanians,
Be men, dear friends, remember furious strength,
Until I put upon me the blameless
armor
Of Achilles, beautiful armor which, When I killed Patroclus, I stripped from him.”
He spoke and left the deadly battle, ran
And overtook his companions, who had not Gone far with Peleus' son's famous
armor.

Apart from tearful battle he exchanged it:
He gave his own for Ilium, and clothed Himself in Peleus' son's immortal
armor,
Which heaven's gods had given to his
dear father,
And Peleus, growing old, had handed
down.
But the son would not grow old in that armor.
When cloud-gathering Zeus saw him putting on The armor of godlike Peleus' son, he shook
His head and spoke within his mighty heart: “Poor man, death is not within your thoughts,
Though it stands near. You wear immortal armor
Of the best man, before whom other
men Tremble; his gentle, strong companion you Have killed, and stripped his armor head to foot Against all order. I will grant you
strength;
But Andromache shall not receive the armor
Of Peleus' son when you return no more.”
So Cronus' son nodded beneath his dark brows,
And fitted armor to the body of
Hector;
Then Enyalios, terrible god of war,

Entered his limbs, and filled them with great strength.
He went among his famous allies,
calling
In a great voice, and seemed to all the men
To wear the armor of great-hearted Peleus' son.
He urged Mesthles, Glaucus, Medon, Thersilochus, Asteropeon, Deisenor, Hippothous, Phorcys, Chromius, and Ennomus the seer: “Hear me, unnumbered allies gathered round!
I did not call you here because I lacked A multitude, nor from some need draw you out Of your own cities. I brought you here to guard
The wives and innocent children of our Troy
Against the war-loving Achaeans.
For this I wear your people out with gifts and
food,
And magnify the courage in each
man.
Now turn straight on the enemy: let him die,
Or let him live—that is the speech of
war.
“Whoever drags Patroclus, even dead, Into the horse-taming city, and Ajax yields
Him, I will give that man half the spoils;
I keep the other half. His glory shall Be equal to my own.”

He spoke; they went Straight against the Danaans, hoping to drag
The dead man from beneath Telamonian Ajax.
Fools! Many would give up their lives before
They gained the body.
Ajax spoke to warlike Menelaus: “Dear Menelaus, nourished by Zeus, I no Longer hope that we two shall come alive From this battle. I fear less for Patroclus,
Who soon may feed the dogs and birds of Troy, Than for my head and yours, since war's cloud covers all And Hector is sudden destruction
here.
Call now the best of Danaans, if any hear.”
He spoke; Menelaus did not disobey.
He shouted through the Greeks until his voice Carried: “Dear friends, leaders and guardians,
You who drink the people's due beside the kings,
And each gives signs of command to his own people—Honor and glory from Zeus follow you all.
It is hard to seek each leader one by one Within this tumult. Let whoever can come Come now, and let his heart be shamed that Greeks

Should leave Patroclus for the Trojan women
And dogs.”
Swift Ajax, Oileus' son, heard him and first Came running to the battle. After him came Idomeneus and Meriones, his friend, Equal to murderous Enyalios. Who could Name all the others who stirred the Achaean fight
Again from behind?
The Trojans came together, Hector leading them.
As a great wave roars at the mouth of a river Fed by the sky, while sea and shore thunder round it, So Troy advanced with a cry. The Achaeans stood Around Menoetius' son with one
heart,
Fenced by their bronze shields; Cronus' son poured mist Around their shining helmets. He had not hated Menoetius' son while he lived beside Achilles;
He hated that the man should become prey For Trojan dogs, and therefore roused the friends Around him to defend him.
The Trojans drove bright-eyed Achaeans back.
They left the dead behind and shrank away;
Yet the high-hearted Trojans, eager as they were,

Could take no living man with spear, but dragged
The corpse alone. For a little while the Greeks
Were forced to yield; then Ajax turned them back—Ajax who surpassed all Danaans in form
And deed, after blameless Peleus'
son.
Through the foremost fighters he sprang like a boar Whose courage scatters dogs and mountain youths
When, wheeling in the valleys, it breaks their ranks.
So glorious Ajax scattered all who
stood Around Patroclus, thinking to drag him home
And win renown.
Hippothous, Lethus' glorious Pelagian son,
Had tied a strap around Patroclus' ankle,
And dragged his foot through bitter battle, wishing To please both Hector and the Trojans. But no man Could hold the evil back.
Telamonian Ajax
Sprang through the crowd and struck him close at hand Through the bronze cheek-piece of his helmet. The crest Rang on the shaft beneath the spear's great blow;
His brain ran bloody by the ear. His strength

Was loosed; Patroclus' great foot fell
away.
He fell face forward by the dead, far off From rich Larissa, and could not repay His parents for their rearing; brief
his life,
Cut short beneath great Ajax' spear.
Hector cast his shining spear at Ajax.
Ajax Saw it and turned aside a little; but
the spear
Struck Schedius, Iphitus' great-hearted son,
Best of the Phocians, ruler of Panopeus.
The bronze passed beneath his collarbone and came Out above the farther shoulder.
Down he fell;
His armor rang around him.
Ajax struck Phorcys, son of Phaenops, as he stood Above Hippothous, in the middle of his belly.
He split the hollow corselet; bronze poured through His inward parts. Phorcys fell into the dust
And clutched the earth. The foremost fighters and Bright Hector gave ground; Argives raised a cry, Dragged Phorcys and Hippothous away, and stripped
The armor from their shoulders.
The Trojans then would have entered Ilium,

Overcome by Argives and their failing courage;
And Greeks would have won glory by their strength, Beyond the will of Zeus—if Apollo had not Roused Aeneas, taking the shape of Periphas, Epytus' son, the herald grown old
beside Aeneas' aged father, faithful in speech.
In his likeness Zeus's son spoke to Aeneas:
“Aeneas, how could you defend Ilium even Against a god, when you have seen men trust In strength, in courage, numbers, and a people Greater than our own? Zeus desires victory
For us, not Danaans; yet you tremble here
And will not fight.” Aeneas knew Apollo when he looked him in The face, and called to Hector and the leaders: “Hector, and all you captains of the
Trojans
And allies, it would be shameful to enter Troy Because Achaeans conquered us through cowardice.
Some god, I think, has stood beside me and said That Zeus, the highest counselor, is our help.

Let us go straight against the Danaans, and not Let them carry Patroclus, though dead, toward
The ships.”
He spoke, and leaped beyond the foremost fighters,
And stood before them; the others turned and faced The Achaeans. Then Aeneas struck Leiocritus
With his spear.
Lycomedes pitied Arisbas' fallen son, His noble friend; he came close and cast his spear.
It struck Apisaon, Hippasus' son, Shepherd of men, beneath the liver, under
The midriff, and his knees gave way
at once.
From deep-soiled Paeonia he had
come,
And often with Asteropeus had held The foremost place in battle. Seeing him fall, Asteropeus rushed forward, grieving,
eager
To fight the Danaans, but could not reach them: Everywhere shields stood around Patroclus,
And spears projected. Great Ajax moved among Them all, giving commands: “Let no man draw back From the dead, nor stand apart before the Argives In the first rank. Let us plant ourselves close

Around him, and fight hand to
hand.”
The dark earth ran red; near-set fighters fell, Trojans and Danaans together. Yet
the Greeks
Did not fight without bloodshed; fewer died,
For each remembered how to ward death from
The companion standing in the press.
So fought they like a fire; you could not say
The sun or moon still shone, so thick the mist Around the foremost warriors by the dead Menoetius' son. The other Trojans and Well-greaved Achaeans fought beneath clear sky;
The sun's sharp light lay spread across the earth,
And no cloud covered mountain or
the plain.
They fought by pauses, standing far
apart,
Avoiding arrows' groans; but those within
The mist and battle bore the pitiless
bronze,
Which wore the bravest down.
Still Thrasymedes and Antilochus Had not heard that blameless Patroclus died;
They thought him living, fighting foremost still Among the Trojans. They had gone
apart,

Looking toward death and the flight of friends,
As Nestor had commanded from the
ships.
All day the grievous strife rose; weariness
And sweat soiled knees, shins, feet beneath each man, His hands and eyes, as they fought around the good Companion of swift-footed Aeacides.
As when a man gives his people a great ox-hide, Wet with oil, to stretch; they stand apart and draw It round in a circle, and the moisture leaves,
The oil sinks inward, and the hide grows wide
As many pull it outward from each side—So there they dragged the corpse a little way In either direction. Each believed it would prevail:
Trojans to haul him toward the city,
Greeks
Toward hollow ships. Around him rose a struggle That Ares or Athena could not scorn,
Though anger reached its height.
Such evil Zeus Stretched over Patroclus that day, on
men
And horses alike.
And Achilles still had not learned his friend's death.

Far from the ships he fought beneath Troy's wall;
His heart expected Patroclus to live, Pressed at the gates, and surely to return.
He could not think to take the city without His friend, nor his friend without him. Many times His mother had told him the great purposes
Of Zeus, but not the full evil fallen on him:
His dearest companion had perished.
The fighters held their sharpened spears around
The body, pressing on and slaughtering.
Then one bronze-clad Achaean cried:
“Friends,
There is no honor in returning to the
ships.
Let black earth open here for every
man;
That is far better than to yield this body
To horse-taming Troy, that they may drag him in And win themselves renown.”
A great-hearted Trojan Answered: “Even if fate has fixed that all
Of us be overcome beside this man, Let no one flee the battle.”
So each aroused
The strength of each; the iron, brazen uproar Rose through the tireless air to heaven.

The horses of Aeacus' son stood
apart
And wept when first they learned their charioteer Had fallen in the dust beneath man-killing Hector.
Automedon, brave son of Diores,
struck
Them often with the lash, and often spoke
In gentleness, and threatened them;
but they Would neither turn back to the ships
beside
The broad Hellespont, nor enter the
battle.
They stood like a pillar set upon a tomb
Of man or woman, holding splendid
chariot,
Their heads fixed firmly toward the ground. Hot tears Ran down their eyelids to the earth as they mourned
The charioteer; their thick manes, fallen from
The yoke, were soiled on either side.
Cronus' son saw them mourning and pitied them.
He shook his head and spoke within
his heart:
"Poor creatures, why did we give you to mortal Peleus, You ageless, deathless ones, to suffer sorrow Among wretched men? Of all that breathe and creep, Nothing is more miserable than a
man.

Yet Hector, Priam's son, shall not drive you and Your wrought car away; I will not let
him.
Is it not enough that he possesses
armor
And boasts above it vainly? I will put Courage into your knees and spirit, so you carry Automedon safely from the fight to
ships.
I grant you glory still: you shall kill
until You reach the well-benched ships, and the sun sinks And holy darkness comes."
He breathed courage into them.
They shook the dust From their manes and swept the chariot through Trojans and Achaeans. Automedon fought,
Grieving his friend, leaping with the horses like A hawk among geese. He could flee the uproar,
And spring upon the crowd to follow
them,
But could not take a man while driving fast;
Alone within the sacred car, he could not Thrust with spear and hold the eager
horses.
At last Alcimedon saw him, Laerces' Son, Haemon's son, and stood behind the car:
"Automedon, what god has put this fruitless

Counsel in your breast, robbed you of your sense?
How do you fight Trojans alone in front, While your companion lies dead, and Hector wears Aeacus' armor on his shoulders?" Automedon replied: "What other Achaean
Could equal you to hold these deathless horses, Unless Patroclus, equal to the gods In counsel, lived? But death and fate have found him.
Take whip and silent reins; I will leap down
And fight."
Alcimedon sprang forward to the team
And took the whip and reins.
Automedon leaped down.
Glorious Hector saw, and called to Aeneas,
Who stood close by: "Aeneas, counselor of The bronze-clad Trojans, I see these two horses Of swift Aeacus appearing in the
battle
With wretched charioteers. Perhaps we could seize Them, if your heart agrees; for neither of us Could stand against the charge of Ares himself
If they came at us."
The son of Anchises did not refuse.
They went straight at the team, their shoulders wrapped

In dry, hard oxhide; much bronze flashed upon them.
With Hector came Chromius and godlike Aretus;
Both pressed the team, hoping to kill the two
And drive away the high-necked horses. Fools!
They were not destined to leave Automedon
Unblooded. Automedon prayed to Father Zeus;
His dark heart filled with courage and with strength.
He spoke to faithful Alcimedon:
"Do not hold back the horses far
from me;
Let them breathe on your back. I do not think That Hector, Priam's son, will check his fury
Until he mounts the fair-maned horses of Achilles, And kills us two, throwing the Argive ranks
Into a flight—unless he first is taken there.
"Ajax, leaders of Argives, and Menelaus,
Leave the dead to those who stand around him,
The best men, to defend him from
the ranks;
But guard us two while we ward off pitiless death.
For Hector and Aeneas, best of
Trojans,
Have made this tearful battle fierce against us.

Yet all these things lie on the gods'
knees;
I too will cast my spear, and Zeus will care
For what remains."
He hurled the long-shadowed spear.
It struck Aretus' even shield; the shield gave way,
And bronze passed beneath the belt into
The lower belly. As a young man with a sharp Axe, striking behind a field-fed ox's horns, Cuts through the sinew, and the beast springs forward Then falls upon its back, so Aretus sprang
And fell backward; the spear quivered in his belly And loosed his limbs.
Hector cast his shining spear at Automedon;
Automedon saw it and bent aside.
The spear
Passed behind him, sank into the
earth,
And spent its force of war. The two would now Have rushed together with their swords at close Quarters, but both Ajaxes, hearing their friend, Came through the crowd. Hector, Aeneas, and Godlike Chromius recoiled, leaving Aretus
With his heart torn out.

Automedon, like swift Ares, stripped
the dead
Man of his armor and spoke in triumph:
"Now surely I have lightened, just a little,
The grief for Menoetius' fallen son, Though one man lies beneath my hand for him."
He lifted the blood-stained spoils into
The chariot, mounted, feet and hands above them, Bloodied like a lion after feeding on a bull.
Again the hard and tearful battle broke Around Patroclus. Athena came from heaven To wake the struggle; Zeus, whose voice is wide, Had sent her, for his purpose now had changed.
As when Zeus stretches a purple rainbow through The sky, a sign to men of war or storm
That makes them cease their labor and afflicts
The sheep, so she wrapped herself in purple cloud, Entered the Achaeans, and stirred every man.
First she urged Menelaus, Atreus'
son,
Mighty in battle, taking Phoenix' shape And tireless voice: "Shame and reproach will be yours

If Troy's swift dogs drag under their wall the friend Of noble Achilles. Stand fast with all your strength,
And stir the army."
Menelaus answered:
"Old father Phoenix, ancient in your years,
If only Athena would give me
strength,
And turn the weapons' rush aside! I would gladly Stand by Patroclus and defend him;
the dead
Has struck my spirit deeply. But Hector holds A terrible courage, and destroys with bronze;
Zeus gives him glory."
The bright-eyed goddess rejoiced that he had asked Her first among the gods. She put strength into His shoulders and his knees, and in his breast
The courage of a fly that, driven from a man's Skin, will not cease to bite, for human blood Is sweet to it. With such courage she filled His heart. He came to Patroclus and cast
His shining spear.
Among the Trojans stood rich and brave Podes, Eetion's son, whom Hector honored most,
His dear companion at the feast.
Menelaus

Struck him beneath the belt as he rushed away;
The bronze passed through. Podes fell with a crash,
And Menelaus dragged him from the
Trojans
Into the ranks of his companions.
Apollo stood beside Hector, taking the shape Of Phaenops, Asius' son, dearest of Hector's guest-friends, living in Abydos.
In his likeness the Far-Shooter spoke: "Hector, who would fear you now among Achaeans, When you yield to Menelaus, once a soft-handed Spearman? Now he goes alone, bearing the dead Away from Troy, and has killed your faithful friend, Podes, Eetion's son, first among the brave."
A black cloud covered Hector's heart. He went Through the first ranks in flashing bronze. The son Of Cronus took the tasselled, shining aegis, Hid Ida in the clouds, and thundered greatly, Flashing and shaking it. He granted victory
To Troy and put the Achaeans to flight.
First Boeotian Peneleus began to flee; Polydamas had struck his shoulder as he faced
The enemy, and the spear grazed bone beneath

The flesh. Hector wounded Leitus,
son
Of Alectryon, near the wrist, and stopped his fight.
He looked about and fled, no longer hoping
To face the Trojans with a spear in hand.
As Hector charged after Leitus,
Idomeneus
Struck him in the corselet, breast
beside
The nipple; the long spear broke within its socket.
The Trojans cried. Hector cast his spear at him,
But missed by little. Then he struck Coeranus, Meriones' companion and charioteer,
Who followed him from well-built Lycus.
Meriones had left the ships and come on foot; Coeranus drove the fleet horses to
him, Bringing him light and warding off
the day,
But losing his own life beneath man-killing Hector.
The spear struck under jaw and ear, drove out
His teeth, and cut the tongue in two.
He fell
From the chariot; reins spilled upon
the ground.
Meriones bent and gathered them, then called:
"Now lash the horses till you reach
the ships;

You know the Achaeans have no strength remaining." Idomeneus lashed the fair-maned horses toward The hollow ships, for fear had entered his heart.
Nor did great Ajax or Menelaus escape
The notice of Zeus, when he gave Troy the victory.
Great Telamonian Ajax began to speak:
"Even the most childish man can know that Zeus Himself is helping Troy. Every weapon strikes, Whether a bad man casts it or a good; Zeus directs all. Our weapons fall uselessly.
Come, let us find the counsel best:
how to drag
The dead away, and return alive, bringing joy
To friends who look this way in anguish and no longer Think Hector's murderous hands can be held back.
Would some companion quickly carry word
To Peleus' son; I do not think he has heard—
The grievous message that his dearest friend is dead.
But nowhere can I see such a man
among
The Danaans; men and horses alike are held In mist. Father Zeus, deliver us from dark;

Make clear air come, and grant our eyes to see; Then slay us in the light, if that is your will.”
He spoke, and Father Zeus pitied him. He scattered The mist and thrust the cloud away; the sun Shone forth, and all the battle stood revealed.
Ajax, strong in the war-cry, spoke to Menelaus: “Look now, Menelaus, child of Zeus, and see If Nestor's great-hearted son Antilochus lives.
Urge him to run to swift Achilles, and tell him His dearest friend has fallen.” Menelaus did not refuse. He went like a lion From a fold, when weary of rousing dogs and men Who will not let him take the fat of cattle, Though they have watched all night. Hungry for flesh, He presses on but gains nothing; thick spears leap From bold hands, brands burn in the air; he rushes, Yet fears them, and at dawn goes off with wounded heart.
So Menelaus unwillingly left Patroclus, Fearing the Greeks, overcome by grievous flight, Would leave him prey. He gave commands to Meriones And both the Ajaxes:

“Ajax, leaders of Argives, and Meriones, Remember each the kindness of poor Patroclus, Gentle to all while living. Now death and fate Have found him.”
Then golden-haired Menelaus went, Searching like an eagle, said to have the keenest sight Among all birds beneath the sky; even high above, The hare beneath a leafy bush escapes him not.
He swoops and takes its life. So everywhere Menelaus searched the many ranks of friends, To see if Nestor's son still lived. At last he saw him on the battle's leftmost wing, Encouraging his companions, urging them to fight.
Menelaus came near and said: “Antilochus,
Child of Zeus, come and learn the grievous news, The thing that should not have occurred. You see already What evil god rolls over Danaans, and that The Trojans hold the victory. Patroclus, Best of Achaeans, is dead; a great longing Has fallen on the Danaans. Run at once To Achilles beside the ships, and tell him whether

He may save the naked body for the ship; Hector of the shining helmet holds the armor.” Horror struck Antilochus at these words.
For a long time speechlessness held him; his eyes Filled with tears, his clear voice could not rise.
Yet he did not neglect the command.
He ran,
And gave his armor to blameless Laodocus,
Who was turning the single-hoofed horses near him.
With tears falling, his feet bore him from the fight To Peleus' son, carrying the evil message.
Menelaus' heart still would not leave his weary friends Unprotected where Antilochus had gone. He sent Noble Thrasymedes to them, while he himself Returned again to Patroclus and stood beside The Ajaxes: “I sent that man to the ships, To run to swift Achilles. Yet I do not think He will come, though he is terribly angered at Hector; He cannot fight the Trojans naked. Let us devise The best counsel: how to drag away the corpse, And how to escape death and fate amid Troy's uproar.”

Great Telamonian Ajax answered: “You have spoken
In due measure, glorious Menelaus. But you And Meriones must stoop, lift up the body, And carry it out of battle; we two behind Will fight the Trojans and divine Hector, Of one spirit, as we have always stood together And endured sharp Ares.”
They bent and lifted the corpse high from the ground.
The Trojan host cried out when they saw them raise The dead, and rushed like dogs upon a wounded boar Before young hunters. For a time they run to tear it; But when it turns in strength, they scatter trembling.
So Trojans followed in a mass with swords And double-edged spears; but when the Ajaxes turned And faced them, every color changed, and no one dared To spring against the corpse.
Thus the two carried Patroclus with all their strength From battle toward the hollow ships, while war Stretched behind them like fire that rushes on A city, blazing high while houses shrink In glare and wind roars through it.
The unwearied uproar

Of horses and spear-bearing men followed.
As mules that gather all their strength drag down From mountains by a rugged path a great beam Or long ship's mast, their hearts and bodies spent In haste, labor, and sweat, so these men strained And bore the corpse. Behind them the two Ajaxes Held back the Trojans like a wooded ridge that checks Water above a plain, restraining river streams
And turning all their rush across the fields;
Waters cannot break it by their force. So always
The Ajaxes drove the battle back.
The Trojans followed,
And above all Aeneas and bright
Hector.
As starlings or jackdaws come clamoring on When they see a hawk approaching, bringing death
Among the little birds, so beneath
Aeneas
And Hector Achaeans fled with dreadful cries, Forgetting courage. Many handsome pieces of armor Fell around the corpse and around the ditch
As Danaans fled; the war would not grow slack.

Source range: Book 17. Full-book provisional draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 18

First-pass working translation

The armies fought like a flame consuming all,
And Antilochus came to Achilles, who stood Before the beaked ships, troubled in
his heart:
“Why are the long-haired Achaeans driven back Again from the plain? May the gods not bring The grief my mother once foretold—that, while I live, The best of Myrmidons would leave the light
Of day beneath Troy's hands. Surely now Menoetius' brave son is dead; I charged him, When he had driven the fire away, to turn Back to the ships and never meet with Hector.” The noble son of Nestor came in
tears:
“Son of Peleus, warrior most terrible, You hear a bitter message, would it had not been.
Patroclus lies dead; the armies fight around His naked body. Hector holds the
armor.”
A black cloud covered Achilles. With both hands
He seized the smoking dust and poured it over

His head; ash stained the nectar-bright tunic.
He stretched his body full-length upon the dust,
And tore his hair with his own hands. The women, Taken in war by Achilles and his friend,
Cried round him, beat their breasts, and ran from tents.
Antilochus poured tears and held his
hands,
Fearing he might cut his throat with iron.
Achilles cried; his honored mother heard him
Deep in the sea beside her aged
father.
She cried aloud, and all the Nereids gathered:
Glauce, Thalia, Cymodoce, Nesaia, Speio, Thoe, Halia, Cymothoe, Actaia, Limnoreia, Melite, Iuera, Amphithoe, Agave, Doto, Proto, Pherusa, Dynamene, Dexamenê, Amphinome, Callianeira, Doris, Panope, Galatea, Nemertes, Apseudes, Callianassa, Clymene, Ianira, Ianassa, Maira, Oreithyia, fair-haired Amatheia, And all the others dwelling in the sea's depth.
Their bright cave filled with them;
all struck their breasts.
Thetis began: “Hear me, sisters, Nereids,
That all may know the grief within me. I bore
A son blameless and strong beyond the heroes,

Who sprang like a young tree. I raised him like A plant within a garden, sent him
out
On curved ships to Ilium; but I shall not Receive him returning to Peleus'
house.
While he lives and sees the sun, he suffers, and I cannot help him. Still I go to hear What sorrow has reached him." She left the cave; the goddesses went with her.
The sea waves opened round them.
At Troy's rich shore They rose in close array beside the
ships
Of many swift Myrmidons. The honored mother Stood near her groaning son, seized his head, and said:
"Child, why do you weep? What grief has entered you?
Speak it; do not conceal it. All the things
You prayed for with uplifted hands—Achaeans Penned against the sterns, needing you—Zeus has done." Swift-footed Achilles answered through his groan:
"My mother, Zeus has brought these things to pass.
But what joy remains, since my dear friend is dead, Patroclus, whom I honored as my own head?
Hector killed him and stripped the armor from him,

The splendid gifts the gods gave Peleus when They joined you, goddess, to a mortal
man.
"Would you had stayed among the deathless sea-gods,
And Peleus taken a mortal wife!
Now grief
Beyond measure enters your heart; you will not Receive your son returning. Nor does my spirit Command me to live unless Hector
first,
Struck beneath my spear, loses life and pays
The price for Menoetius' son. Let me die now:
Far from his fatherland he fell, needing me.
I shall not return to my own land, nor was I light to Patroclus or the friends whom Hector Laid low. I sit useless beside the
ships,
A burden on the earth.
"Would strife might perish from
gods and men,
And anger, sweeter than honey in the mouth,
That makes the wise grow harsh and swells like smoke.
Agamemnon angered me; let the past lie past.
Necessity now master us. I go to find Hector, then take the death Zeus sends. Not even Heracles escaped it, dearest to Zeus;

Fate mastered him and Hera's anger.
So shall I Lie when my fate comes. But now let me win fame,
And make Trojan and Dardanian women wipe Their tears, and know I have rested from the war.
Do not restrain me; you cannot." Silver-footed Thetis answered through her tears:
"It is right to defend companions in destruction.
Yet your armor is among the Trojans; Hector
Wears it and glories in it. He will not glory long.
Do not enter Ares' labor till you see me return;
At dawn I shall come with beautiful
armor
From Hephaestus."
She turned and spoke to her sisters:
"Sink beneath
The sea's broad fold, see our father, tell him all.
I go to Olympus, to the famed smith, And ask for glorious armor for my
son."
They sank beneath the wave; Thetis went toward Olympus and the master of the forge.
Thetis' feet bore her toward Olympus; meanwhile Well-greaved Achaeans fled before man-slaying Hector, Reaching ships and Hellespont. They could not yet Drag Patroclus from the weapons: host and horses

Came upon him again, and Hector, flame-like in His strength. Three times he seized the dead man's feet, Eager to drag him, calling to the Trojans;
Three times the Ajaxes, clothed in furious strength,
Shook him away. Yet Hector trusted in His steadfast might, leaping into the tumult, Standing and shouting terribly, refusing to withdraw.
As shepherds in the fields cannot drive a lion, Bright-maned, from a great and famished beast's dead body, So the two Ajaxes could not make Hector fear Or draw him from the fallen. He would have dragged The corpse away and won boundless glory, had not Swift Iris, wind-footed messenger, run from Olympus To Peleus' son, secretly summoning him to arm;
Hera had sent her before Zeus or the
immortals
Around snow-crowned Olympus knew.
She stood near him and spoke: "Rise, son of Peleus,
Most terrible of men. Defend
Patroclus,
For whom the bitter battle stands
beside
The ships, and men destroy each other—some

Defend the dead, while Trojans drag him toward Windy Ilium. Hector most of all desires To haul him off, sever his tender neck,
And set his head upon the stakes.
Rise! Let reverence For Patroclus enter you, lest he become A plaything for Trojan dogs, and shame be yours.” Swift-footed Achilles answered: “Iris, goddess,
Which of the gods has sent you as a messenger?”
Wind-footed Iris answered: “Hera sent me,
The glorious wife of Zeus. The high-throned son Of Cronus does not know, nor any immortal
Who dwells on snowy Olympus.” Achilles replied: “How can I go to battle?
They hold my armor. My dear mother would not let Me arm until I saw her come before my eyes;
She promised beautiful weapons from Hephaestus.
I know no other shield I could put
on,
Unless it were great Ajax's—but I think
He stands among the foremost, striking round
The body of Patroclus.” Iris answered: “We know your famous armor lies

Within their hands. Go as you are to the trench,
Show yourself to Troy; perhaps they will fear you, Hold back from battle, and the war-worn sons
Of Achaeans draw one breath from all their labor.”
She spoke and left. Achilles, dear to Zeus, arose;
Athena cast the tasselled aegis round his shoulders,
Set a golden cloud about his head, and kindled Within it flame that shone afar.
As smoke rises from a city toward
the sky,
From an island far away where hostile armies Fight around the walls, and through the day are judged By hateful Ares outside their native
city,
But when the sun goes down the watch-fires blaze In triple ranks, their light leaping high that neighbors May see and bring defenders in their
ships,
So from Achilles' head the shining reached the air.
He went from the wall and stood upon the trench, Not mingling with Achaeans, for he watched
His mother's solemn command.
There he stood and cried aloud; far off Athena Lifted her voice, and among the Trojans raised

An immeasurable panic. As a trumpet's cry, Clear and piercing round a city when enemies Surround it, so rang the voice of Aeacus' son.
All hearts were shaken; fair-maned horses turned Their chariots back, foreseeing grief.
Charioteers Were struck with terror when they saw the tireless fire Burning above the head of Peleus'
son,
Kindled by bright-eyed Athena.
Three times divine Achilles cried above the trench;
Three times Troy and her allies fell confused.
Twelve bravest men died beside their cars and spears.
Then Achaeans gladly dragged Patroclus out
From underneath the weapons, laid him on a bier, And dear companions stood around him mourning.
Achilles followed, shedding hot tears, when he saw His faithful friend upon the bier, torn by bronze—
The man he sent with horses and a chariot,
But never welcomed home.
Ox-eyed, honored Hera forced the tireless sun
To turn back into Oceanus' streams
against
Its will. The sun went down; divine Achaeans ceased

From war's fierce force and from the equal battle.
The Trojans withdrew, unyoked their swift horses, And gathered in council before the evening meal.
They stood upright; none dared sit, for trembling held Them all since Achilles, long absent from the fight, Had shown himself. Prudent Polydamas alone
Could see before him and behind; Hector's companion, Born with him in one night, one strong in speech,
The other in the spear, he addressed the assembly:
"Consider, friends. Let us go into the city;
Do not await bright dawn here on the plain beside The ships, far from the wall. While this man raged Against Agamemnon, Achaeans were easier;
I was glad to sleep beside the ships, hoping
To take the curved vessels. But now I fear Swift-footed Peleus' son; his spirit overmasters him.
He will not stay where Troy and Achaeans divide
The strength of Ares; he will fight for city And women. Come within the city and believe me.
Tonight immortal night has stopped him; if tomorrow

He finds us here, roused with his armor, one among us Will know him well. Gladly will reach holy Ilium
The man who escapes; many Trojans will the dogs
And vultures eat—would that the word might pass
From ear into the deed!
“If we heed my counsel, Though our hearts grieve, we will hold the assembly Through night, and shut the towers, gates, and long-fitted Doors within the city. At dawn we arm and stand Upon the towers. Then he will find it hard,
Coming from ships to fight around our wall.
He will return to ships when he has tired His high-necked horses driving beneath the city;
His spirit will not let him rush
within,
Nor will he take it. Before that, white dogs
Will eat him.”
Crest-bright Hector answered darkly: “These words No longer please me when you tell us to go back.
Have you not had enough of being penned within The towers? Once men called Priam's city rich
In gold and bronze; now our beautiful treasures

Are gone, possessions sold to Phrygia
and Fair Maeonia, since Zeus has grown angry.
“Now Cronus' son has granted me the glory to win Beside the ships and drive Achaeans to the sea;
Do not, fool, bring such thoughts before the people.
No Trojan will obey you, nor will I permit it.
Let every man obey as I command:
take food
Throughout the camp, remember watch, and stay awake.
Let any Trojan overly proud of possessions
Give them out for the common feast; it is better
One of our own should enjoy them than Achaeans.
At dawn we arm and wake sharp Ares beside The hollow ships. If godlike Achilles has risen,
It will be worse for him if he desires it so;
But I will not flee the bitter fight. I stand Face to face, whether he carries strength away, Or I carry it. Enyalios is common to all:
The killer may himself be killed.”
The Trojans shouted their approval, poor fools;
Athena had taken their wits away.
They praised

Hector, who counseled evil; no one remembered The excellent counsel of Polydamas.
They ate throughout the camp. All night Achaeans Mourned Patroclus. The son of Peleus led The loud lament, laying his man-killing hands Upon his friend's breast, groaning like a bearded lion Whose cubs a hunter has snatched from the forest.
Too late the lion comes, searching ravines along The man's tracks, possessed by bitter anger.
Achilles groaned among the Myrmidons:
"Ah me, I spoke a vain word when I encouraged Menoetius in his halls, promising to bring His glorious son back to Opous, after sacking Ilium, and give him his share of spoil. Yet Zeus Fulfills not every thought of men. For both of us It is fated to stain this earth in Troy; Nor shall horse-driving Peleus receive me home,
Nor Thetis; earth herself will hold me here.
"Patroclus, since I go beneath the earth after you, I will not bury you till I have brought here
The armor and the head of Hector, your slayer.

Before your pyre I will cut the throats of twelve Glorious Trojan children, furious because you died.
Until then lie beside the curved ships, while Trojan And deep-bosomed Dardanian women mourn you, Shedding tears through night and day—women whose rich Cities we took by force and our long spear." He ordered his companions to set a great tripod Upon the fire, to wash Patroclus quickly Of blood-stained mortal dust. They set the bath-tripod, Poured water in, and kindled wood beneath it.
Fire surrounded the belly; water warmed Within the shining bronze. When it boiled, they washed The body, anointed it with oil, and filled The wounds with ointment aged nine years. They laid Him on the bier, covered him from head to foot With soft linen, and over it a white sheet.
All night the Myrmidons lamented around Swift-footed Achilles. Then Zeus spoke to Hera:
"You have accomplished your purpose, ox-eyed Hera; You roused swift-footed Achilles. Surely the long-haired Achaeans were born from you yourself.”

So they spoke. Silver-footed Thetis came To Hephaestus' house, imperishable, starry, Conspicuous among immortals—a bronze house
The crooked-footed smith had made for himself.
She found him sweating as he moved
among
The bellows, working urgently; he made Twenty tripods to stand around the wall
Of his well-founded hall. Beneath each base he set Golden wheels, that they might move of themselves Into the gods' assembly, then return—
A wonder to behold. They lacked only handles;
He fitted these, fastening every bond, Working with all the craft his knowing heart possessed.
As Thetis came, Charis of the lovely veil,
Whom the famed smith had made his wife, saw her approach.
She took her hand and called her by name:
“Why have you come, Thetis, long-robed goddess, Honored and dear? You seldom visit
us.
Come farther in; I will set friendship's gifts before you.”

She led her inward, seated her upon A silver-studded throne, beautiful, with footstool.
Then she called Hephaestus, famous for his craft: “Hephaestus, come; Thetis has need of you.”
The crippled smith answered: “Then a goddess terrible And honored must be here, one who saved me when Pain came upon me after my shameless mother Cast me far away, wishing to hide me, lame.
I would have suffered grievously if Eurynome
And Thetis had not caught me in their arms—Eurynome, daughter of Ocean turning back.
With them I lived nine years, forging ingenious works Within their hollow cave: curved clasps, spiral brooches, Cups, and necklaces; around us Ocean's stream,
Immeasurable, roared and foamed.
No god or man Knew me there, but only Thetis and Eurynome,
Who saved my life. Since Thetis has come here,
I owe the fair-haired goddess a full return.
Set gifts of welcome before her while I put away
My bellows and my tools.”
The huge and wondrous smith rose from the anvil,

Limping; his thin legs moved with difficulty.
He set the bellows away and gathered up His tools into a silver chest. With a sponge He wiped his face and hands, his strong neck and His hairy breast; then put a tunic on,
Took up a heavy staff, and limped outside.
Two golden maidens hurried beneath their lord, Like living young women. In their breasts they had Mind, voice, and strength; from gods they had learned The works of gods. They moved beneath his steps Until he came where bright-throned Thetis sat.
He took her hand and called her by her name: “Why have you come, Thetis, long-robed goddess, Honored and dear? You seldom visit us.
Tell me your purpose; my heart commands me to fulfill it, If I can, and if the thing lies within completion.” Thetis answered with tears: “Hephaestus, is there Among Olympian goddesses one who has endured Such grievous sorrows as Zeus, Cronus' son, Has given me? Of all the sea-born sisters he gave Me to a mortal, Aeacides Peleus;

Against my will I endured the marriage bed.
Now he lies in his house, broken by old age.
And I have further sorrow: when he gave me a son To bear and raise, a hero beyond all others, Who sprang like a young tree, I raised him as A garden plant and sent him on curved ships To Ilium to fight the Trojans; but I shall not Receive him home again to Peleus' house.
While he lives and sees the sun, he suffers; I cannot help him, though I go to him.
“The maiden the Achaeans gave him as his prize, Agamemnon took from him. For her my son Consumed his heart in grief; while Troy drove Greeks Back to the sterns and kept them past the ships.
The elders of Argos pleaded, naming splendid gifts;
He refused to ward off ruin. Yet he clothed Patroclus in his armor and sent him out, Giving him a great host; all day they fought Around the Scaean Gates, and would have taken Troy Had not Apollo, after doing much harm, Killed Menoetius' brave son among

the foremost,
And given glory to Hector.
"Therefore I come to your knees: if you are willing,
Give my short-lived son a shield, a helmet,
Beautiful greaves fitted at the ankles, and a corselet.
His own were lost with his faithful friend, subdued By Trojans; he lies upon the earth in grief."
The famous smith answered: "Take courage; let not These things trouble you. Would that I could hide him From death's grievous noise when his fate comes,
As surely as beautiful armor shall be his,
Such as another man, among the many generations,
Will wonder at when he looks upon it."
He left her there and went among the bellows.
He turned them toward the fire and bade them work.
Twenty bellows blew together through their mouths, Breathing every wind that kindles flame; now rushing
To help him in his haste, now falling quiet, As Hephaestus willed and as the work required.
He cast untiring bronze upon the
fire,

Tin, precious gold, and silver; set the great anvil Firmly in its stand; grasped the mighty hammer
In one hand, and in the other took the pincers.
First he made a shield, great and strong, and wrought Its surface everywhere with cunning art.
Around it he laid a shining triple rim,
And fastened on a silver strap. The shield
Had five folds; within its breadth he worked Many things, with all the wisdom of his heart.
There he made the earth, the heavens, and the sea, The tireless sun, the full moon, and all the signs
With which the sky is crowned: the Pleiades,
The Hyades, Orion's strength, and the Bear, Whom men call Wain, turning in its place and watching Orion, yet alone denied the baths of Ocean.
Upon it he made two cities of mortal
men, Beautiful. In one were weddings and splendid feasts; Brides were led beneath the torchlight from their chambers Through the city, while the marriage song rose loud.
Young dancers whirled; flutes and lyres sent music out,

And women stood in every doorway, watching, amazed.

The people gathered in the market-place. A quarrel

Had arisen: two men disputed blood-price for

A dead man. One promised to pay all, speaking it

Before the people; one refused to take it.

Both wished a judge to bring the matter to an end.

The crowd shouted for each, supporting each in turn,

But heralds held them back. The elders sat on stones

Polished within the sacred circle, holding staffs

Of clear-voiced heralds. Each rose and gave judgment.

In the midst lay two talents of gold, to be given

To the man among them who should speak most straightly.

Around the other city two armies sat
in bronze,

Their counsel divided: whether to sack the lovely city,

Or share among themselves the wealth it held within.

Its people did not yield, but went secretly

To lie in ambush. Wives and dear children stood

Upon the wall to guard it, with old men held back

By age. The hidden army moved; Ares and Athena

Led them, both golden, clad in golden raiment,

Beautiful and great, conspicuous above the men.

They reached the river where the herds came down to drink,

And sat apart in flashing bronze.
Two scouts stood off

From the army, waiting till they saw the sheep

And horned cattle. Soon the herds appeared, two herdsmen

Following, glad in their pipes, foreseeing no deceit.

The ambushers rushed upon them, cut down the cattle,

The white-fleeced sheep, and killed the shepherds.

The besiegers heard the uproar among the herds;

The scouts mounted their high-stepping horses, rode out, And swiftly came upon the raiders.

They halted,

Fought beside the river, cast bronze-tipped spears.

Strife was there, and Tumult, and deadly Death;

Death held a newly wounded man still alive,

Another unwounded, another already dead,

And dragged a corpse by its feet through the tumult.

Her garment on her shoulders was red with blood

Of men she had slain. They mingled like living men,

Fought, and drew away each other's
dead.

Upon it he set a fallow field, rich and soft,

Thrice-plowed and broad. Many plowmen turned their teams Of oxen back and forth. Whenever they reached
The boundary, a man came forward, gave each hand
A cup of honey-sweet wine; then back they turned Along the furrows, eager for the far boundary.
Behind them earth grew dark, though all the gold remained—A wonder wrought in metal.
Upon it he set a royal estate. Reapers held Sharp sickles and cut the standing grain; the sheaves Fell thick along the furrow. Three binders stood At work; behind them boys gathered cut stalks, Carrying them forward without pause. The king stood Among them, silent, glad at heart, staff in hand,
Upon the furrow. Apart, beneath an oak, Heralds prepared a feast; they had sacrificed
A great ox, while women scattered white meal
For supper to the reapers.
Upon it he set a vineyard, beautiful and golden, Heavy with dark clusters. Vines stood in rows Upon silver poles; around them ran a trench
Dark-blue, and around the trench a fence of tin.

One path alone led through, by which the gatherers Walked when they carried grapes.
Young women, youths Unwed and innocent, bore the honeyed fruit
In woven baskets. Among them a boy With clear lyre sang Linos' lovely song;
The others followed, striking earth
together,
Leaping in time to song and cry.
Upon it he set a herd of straight-horned cattle.
The cows were gold and tin; lowing, they hurried
From the dung-yard to pasture by
the river,
Beside the trembling reeds. Four golden herdsmen Went in line, and nine white-footed dogs followed.
Two terrible lions seized a bellowing bull Among the first cattle; they dragged him off, Lowing long. Dogs and young men pursued; the lions Tore open his hide and gulped his entrails,
Drank the dark blood. The herdsmen sent swift dogs, But dogs held back from biting; close beside them
They barked, then drew away, afraid of jaws.
The famous smith made also a pasture in A lovely valley for great flocks of white sheep,

With covered folds, huts, and roofed pens.

He wrought a dancing floor, like that Daedalus

Made in broad Knossos for fair-haired Ariadne.

There young men and maidens, whose wealth was won By labor, danced, holding each other's wrists.

The maidens wore fine linen; young men wore tunics

Woven with care, shining softly with oil.

The maidens wore beautiful crowns; the youths had

Golden knives hanging from silver baldrics.

Now they ran with practiced feet, as when a potter

At work tries a wheel beneath his palms to see

If it will run; now rows moved toward each other.

A crowd stood round the lovely dance, delighted;

A divine singer played the lyre, while two tumblers

Whirled through the midst, leading the song and dance.

Upon the outer rim of the well-wrought shield

He set Oceanus, the mighty river, Flowing around the world.

When the famed smith had finished that great shield,

He made a corselet brighter than fire's gleam,

A heavy helmet fitted to the temples,

Beautifully wrought, and set a golden crest

Upon it; then he made greaves of pliant tin,

Fitted about the ankles.

When the crippled smith had completed all

The armor, he lifted it and laid it
down

Before Achilles' mother. Like a hawk She sprang from snowy Olympus, carrying

The flashing armor from Hephaestus.

Source range: Book 18. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 19

First-pass working translation

Rose the saffron-robed Dawn from Ocean's streams,
bringing light to immortals and to
mortal men.
She came to the ships, bearing the gifts of the god;
and there she found her dear son
Achilles
weeping clearly beside Patroclus, while many companions mourned around the dead.
She stood among them, took her son's hand, and called him by name:
"My child, let us leave him here, though we grieve, since by the will of the gods he was first subdued.
But you receive from Hephaestus the
famous armor, beautiful as no man has ever borne upon his shoulders."
So speaking, the goddess laid the armor before Achilles; and all its cunning work rang out terribly.
Trembling seized every Myrmidon; no one dared to look straight upon it. They shook with
fear.
But Achilles, when he saw it, felt his anger deepen;
and beneath his eyelids his eyes shone terribly, as though a flame had broken forth.
He rejoiced to hold in his hands the glorious gifts of the god.

When he had gazed his fill upon the shining work, he spoke to his mother in winged
words:

"My mother, the god has given me these weapons;
they are works such as immortal hands should make,
not such as mortal man could finish.
I will arm myself. Yet I greatly fear lest, meanwhile, flies enter the bronze-struck wounds of Menoetius's brave son, breed worms there, disfigure the
dead,
and his life depart while all his flesh decays."

The silver-footed goddess Thetis
answered:

"Let not these things trouble your mind.

I will try to keep from him the savage tribes of flies, which devour men slain in war.
Even if he lies here through a full turning year, his skin shall remain whole, or even fairer than before.

But you call the heroes of the Achaeans to assembly;
renounce your anger against Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, arm yourself quickly for war, and clothe yourself in strength."

So speaking, she breathed great courage into his heart; and over Patroclus she poured ambrosia and red nectar through his nostrils, that his flesh might remain unspoiled.

Divine Achilles went along the shore of the sea, crying aloud in a dreadful voice, and roused the Achaean heroes.
Even those who had remained before beside the ships,
the helmsmen who held the steering-oars, and the storekeepers who served out the grain beside the vessels, then went to the assembly, because Achilles had appeared, after a long absence from the grievous battle.
Two servants of Ares came limping to the assembly, the steadfast son of Tydeus and
godlike Odysseus, leaning upon their spears, for their grievous wounds still troubled them. They went and sat in the foremost places.
Last of all came Agamemnon, lord of
men, bearing his wound; for Coön, son of Antenor,
had struck him with a bronze spear in the hard battle.
When all the Achaeans had gathered
together, swift-footed Achilles rose among them and spoke: “Son of Atreus, was this perhaps better for both of us—for you and for me—that we should consume our hearts with soul-devouring strife over the girl?
Would that Artemis had killed her with an arrow beside the ships on that day when I took Lyrnessus and destroyed it. Then not so many Achaeans

would have bitten the broad earth beneath the hands of their enemies, while I remained in anger.
It would have been an advantage for Hector and the Trojans; but I think the Achaeans will remember for a long time the strife between you and me.
“But let what is past be left, though we grieve;
let us master the dear heart within our breasts by necessity.
Now I put aside my anger, and it is not fitting for me to remain forever in wrath.
Come, rouse the long-haired Achaeans to battle, that I may go and try the Trojans face to face beside the ships, and see whether they wish to sleep there.
I think that many of them will gladly bend the knee, whoever escapes the war beneath my
spear.”
So he spoke; and the well-greaved Achaeans rejoiced, because great-hearted Peleus’s son had laid aside his anger.
Then Agamemnon, lord of men, spoke to them from his seat; he did not rise and stand among the people:
“Friends, heroes, Danaans, servants
of Ares,

it is beautiful to listen when a man is standing among others; it is not fitting to interrupt him, for even a skilled speaker is hindered by the noise of the multitude.
How could one hear or speak clearly in a great throng?
Even a clear-voiced orator is weakened there.
“I will make my defense to the son of Peleus;
and the other Argives, attend and let each understand my words.
Often the Achaeans have spoken this reproach to me, and blamed me for it; but I am not the cause.
Zeus is, and Fate, and the Erinys who walks in darkness; they cast savage Delusion into my mind on that day when I took Achilles’s prize from his hands.
But what could I do? A god brings all things to completion.
“Delusion is the eldest daughter of Zeus,
the accursed one who deludes all; her feet are delicate, for she does not set them upon the ground, but walks upon the heads of men and harms them,
and binds one man beneath another.
Even Zeus, they say, was once deluded, though they call him greatest among
gods and men.

Hera deceived him by her cunning on the day when the strength of Heracles was about to be born to Alcmena in well-crowned Thebes.
“Zeus, rejoicing, spoke among all the gods:
‘Hear me, all you gods and all you goddesses,
that I may tell what my heart within my breast commands.
Today Eileithyia, she who brings the hard birth, shall bring to the light a man who will rule all his neighbors, a man from the blood of my generation.’ “But honored Hera, planning deceit,
answered him:
‘You will lie, nor will you bring your word to completion.
Come now, swear me a mighty oath, Olympian Zeus, that the man who is born today from the feet of a woman, among the men who are of your
blood,
shall rule over all his neighbors.’ “She spoke; Zeus did not perceive the deceit,
but swore a great oath, and then was terribly deluded.
Hera sprang from Olympus’s peak and quickly reached Argos, where she knew the strong wife of Sthenelus, son of Perseus.
She was seven months with her dear
son; Hera brought him forth into the light, though premature, and stopped Alcmena's labor, holding back Eileithia.

Then she herself told Zeus, son of Cronus, the news:
'Father Zeus, lord of the bright lightning, I will put a word into your mind: already a noble man has been born who will rule the Argives, Eurystheus, son of Sthenelus, of your blood; it is not unworthy that he should rule the Argives.' "Sharp grief struck Zeus deeply when he heard it.
At once he seized Delusion by her shining hair, anger in his heart, and swore a mighty oath:
never again should Delusion, who harms all, come to Olympus and the starry
heaven.
He whirled her and cast her from the
sky;
soon she reached the works of men.
And whenever he saw his dear son performing the shameful labors forced upon him by Eurystheus, he would groan.
"So now, when Hector of the shining helmet was destroying the Argives beside the sterns of the
ships,
I could not forget the Delusion with which I first was deluded.
But since I was deluded, and Zeus robbed my mind, I wish to make amends and give boundless recompense.

Rise to battle, and rouse the other people.
All the gifts that glorious Odysseus promised you yesterday in your hut I will provide here.
If you wish, wait here, though your spirit presses toward Ares; my attendants shall bring the gifts from my ship, that you may see I will give them in full."
But swift-footed Achilles answered
him:
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnon, lord of men, give the gifts if you wish, as is fitting, or keep them beside you. Now let us remember the battle quickly; there is no need to linger here or delay, for a great work remains unfinished.
Let a man see Achilles once more among the foremost ranks, destroying the Trojan phalanxes with his bronze spear—" The much-minded Odysseus
answered him:
"Not so, Achilles, excellent though you are and godlike.
Do not urge the sons of the Achaeans, empty of food, to go against Ilium and fight the Trojans;
for the battle will not be short when first the ranks of men meet, and a god breathes courage into both sides.
But command the Achaeans to take food and wine

beside the swift ships; food is strength and courage.
No man can fight face to face all day until the sun goes down without food; even if his spirit longs
to fight, his limbs grow secretly heavy, and thirst and hunger find him, and his knees fail beneath him as he walks.
But the man who has had his fill of wine and food, and fights the enemy all day, keeps a bold heart within him; his limbs do not grow weary until all have withdrawn from battle.
“Come, scatter the people, and command the evening meal.
Let Agamemnon, lord of men, bring the gifts into the midst of the assembly, so that all the Achaeans may see them and you may be glad in your spirit.
Let him rise among the Argives and swear an oath that he has never mounted the girl’s bed or joined with her, as is lawful for a lord over men or women;
and let your own heart within you be gentle again.
Afterward let him make amends to you with a rich feast, so that you may lack nothing of justice.
And you, son of Atreus, shall hereafter be more just in other matters as well. It is no cause for blame when a king makes amends to a man whom he first treated harshly.” Agamemnon, lord of men, answered

him:
“Son of Laertes, I rejoice to hear your
words;
you have spoken all things in due measure and set them forth.
These things I am willing to swear, as my heart commands;
I will not swear falsely before the
god.
Let Achilles remain here, eager though he is for Ares, and let all the others remain gathered,
until the gifts are brought from the hut
and we cut the faithful oaths.
“To you yourself I give this charge and command:
choose the best young men among all
the Achaeans
and bring from my hut all the gifts we promised Achilles yesterday, and bring the women as well.
Let Talthylus quickly prepare a boar to cut in sacrifice for Zeus and the Sun.”
Swift-footed Achilles answered him:
“Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnon, lord of men, you should have made this provision at another time, when there might be a pause in the
battle,
and the strength within my breast was not so great.
But now those men lie torn apart whom Hector, son of Priam, subdued, when Zeus gave him glory.

You urge the men to eat; but I could now command the sons of the Achaeans, empty and without food, to fight until the sun goes down, and then prepare a great meal after we have paid back the outrage.
Before that, no drink or food could pass down my throat, while my companion lies dead, torn
by sharp bronze, within the hut, turned toward the doorway,
and his companions mourn around
him.
No such thing is in my mind now, but killing,
and blood, and the grievous groaning
of men.”
The much-minded Odysseus
answered him:
“Achilles, son of Peleus, far the best of the Achaeans, you are stronger than I, and by no small measure better with the spear; but I might surpass you greatly in counsel, for I was born before you and know more.
Therefore let your heart endure my
words.
Men soon grow weary of war, in which bronze has scattered the greatest harvest upon the earth, and the harvest is smallest when Zeus, the keeper of war for men, weighs the scales toward stillness.
The Achaeans cannot mourn the dead with the belly;

for many fall, and fall in heaps, every day.
When, then, could a man draw breath from his labor?
“The dead must be buried, with a hard heart, after weeping for him through the day in which he died.
But those who remain from the hateful war must remember food and drink, that we may fight the enemy without ceasing,
clothed in unwearied bronze.
Let no man hold back, waiting for another summons from the army; this will be a summons of evil for whoever remains beside the Argive ships.
Let us all rise together and awaken sharp Ares against the horse-taming Trojans.” So he spoke, and brought with him the sons of glorious Nestor, Phyleides, Meges, Thoas, and Meriones, Creontiades Lycomedes, and Melanippus.
They went into the hut of Agamemnon, son of Atreus.
In the same moment the word became deed:
seven tripods were carried from the
hut,
the ones Agamemnon had promised;
twenty shining cauldrons, twelve
horses,
and seven women skilled in blameless work, with Briseis, fair-cheeked, as the eighth.

Odysseus set ten talents of gold in the midst, and the young Achaeans carried the other gifts.
They set them in the center of the assembly, and Agamemnon rose among them.
Talthybius, whose voice was like a god's, stood beside the shepherd of the people, holding the boar in his hands.
Agamemnon drew the knife that hung always beside the great sheath of his sword; beginning at the bristles of the boar, he lifted his hands to Zeus and prayed.
All the Argives sat silent in their proper places, listening to the king.
When he had prayed, looking toward the wide heavens, he spoke:
"Let Zeus first of the gods be witness, and Earth, and the Sun, and the Erinyes beneath the earth, who punish whoever swears falsely among men, that I have never laid a hand upon the girl Briseis, neither seeking her bed nor any other purpose; she remained untouched within my hut.
If I have sworn falsely in this, let the gods give me many sorrows, all those they give to the man who sins after swearing an oath."

So he spoke, and cut the boar's throat with the pitiless bronze.
Talthybius whirled the carcass and cast it into the great gulf of the gray sea, food for the fishes.
Then Achilles rose and spoke to the war-loving Argives:
"Father Zeus, surely you give great delusions to men—" "Agamemnon's quarrel stirred the whole matter from its beginning; no girl could he have led away against my will, but somewhere Zeus desired that many Achaeans should die.
Now go to your meal, that we may gather the strength of Ares."
So he cried, and dismissed the swift assembly.
The men scattered, each to his own ship; but the great-hearted Myrmidons set themselves to their gifts, and carried them aboard the ship of divine Achilles.
They placed the gifts within the huts, seated the women, and the noble attendants drove the horses into the herd.
Then Briseis, like golden Aphrodite, when she saw Patroclus torn by the sharp bronze, fell upon him and cried aloud; with her hands she tore her breast, her tender throat, and her beautiful face. The woman like a goddess spoke, weeping: “Patroclus, most dear to me, unhappy woman that I am, when I left your hut you were living; now, returning, I find you dead, lord of the people.

So evil follows evil forever upon me.
The man to whom my father and honored mother gave me I saw lying before the city, torn by the sharp bronze; and I saw my three brothers, whom one mother bore with me, all dear to me, and all met their fatal day.
“Nor would you let me mourn when swift Achilles killed my husband and sacked the divine city of Mynes; you told me that you would make me the wedded wife of divine Achilles, and lead me in the ships to Phthia, and appoint the marriage feast among the Myrmidons.
Therefore I mourn you without ceasing, though you are dead, you who were always gentle.” So she spoke weeping, and the women groaned around Patroclus, using him as the occasion for each woman’s own grief.
The elders of the Achaeans gathered around Achilles, entreating him to eat; but he refused, groaning:
“I beg you, if any dear companion will obey me,

do not command me to take food or drink
and gladden my heart before the sun has gone down.
I will remain and endure it nevertheless.
Before then no food or drink could pass my throat,
while my companion lies dead, torn
by sharp bronze,
within the hut, turned toward the
doorway,
and his companions mourn around
him.
No other thought delights me now—only killing,
and blood, and the grievous groaning
of men.”
So speaking, he scattered the other kings;
but the two sons of Atreus remained, with godlike Odysseus, Nestor, Idomeneus,
and old horse-taming Phoenix, trying with careful words to delight the grief-stricken man.
But his spirit found no delight before he entered the mouth of the blood-stained war.
Remembering his companion, he groaned deeply and spoke: “Ah, poor friend, most dear of all companions!
You yourself once set a pleasant meal before me
quickly and eagerly in the hut, whenever the Achaeans hastened to carry tearful war
against the horse-taming Trojans.

But now you lie torn apart, while my heart within me is barren of food and drink because I long for you.

No worse thing could befall me, not even if I should hear that my father had died—he who now perhaps sheds a tender tear in Phthia, in want of such a son, while I fight
the Trojans
in a foreign land for hateful Helen; nor even if I heard of my dear son, who is being raised in Scyros—if godlike Neoptolemus still lives there.

“Before, my heart within me hoped that I alone should perish far from horse-pasturing Argos, here in Troy, while you returned to Phthia, that you might bring my son from Scyros in your swift black ship, and show him all my possessions, my servants, and my great high-roofed house.

For now I think Peleus is either wholly dead, or still living a little, suffering bitterly in hateful old age, and waiting always for the grievous news that I am dead.”

So he spoke weeping, and the elders groaned, each remembering what he had left in his own house.

The son of Cronus saw them mourning and pitied them.

At once he spoke to Athena in winged words:

“My child, you have wholly abandoned your own man.

Have you no care at all for Achilles?
There he sits before the beaked ships, mourning his dear companion, while the others have gone to their meal; but he remains without food or portion.

Go now, and pour sweet nectar and ambrosia into his breast, that grievous hunger may not reach
him.”

So he urged Athena, who was already eager to go.

She flew down from heaven through the upper air, like a hawk with clear voice and outspread wings.

Meanwhile the Achaeans armed themselves throughout the camp.
She poured sweet nectar and lovely ambrosia into Achilles’s breast, that painful hunger might not reach
his knees;

then she returned to the strong house of her father, while they poured out from beside the swift ships.

As when thick snowflakes pour forth from Zeus—

—cold beneath the blast of clear-born North—so then the helmets,

brightly gleaming, came forth from the ships, and the bossed shields, the corselets hard against the storm, and the ashwood spears.

Their splendor reached the sky, and all the earth laughed around them beneath the flashing bronze; and the sound of men's feet rose.

In the midst divine Achilles armed himself.

The clatter of his teeth sounded; his two eyes flashed like the gleam of fire, and intolerable grief entered his heart.

Burning with rage against the Trojans, he put on the god's gifts which Hephaestus had wrought for
him.

First he fastened the beautiful greaves around his legs, fitted at the ankles with silver clasps.
Second he placed the corselet around his breast.

Around his shoulders he hung the
bronze sword,
with its silver-studded hilt; and then he took the great and strong shield, whose light shone far away like the moon.

As when a gleam appears to sailors from the sea of a burning fire, high upon a lonely mountain farm, while storms against their will carry them across the fish-filled sea, far from their friends—
so from Achilles's beautiful, cunning shield
the brightness rose into the upper air.

Then he lifted the heavy helmet and set it upon his head;

the horse-haired helmet shone like a star, and the golden hairs which Hephaestus had set thickly around the crest streamed and trembled.

Divine Achilles tested himself in his
armor,

to see whether it fitted and whether his splendid limbs moved freely within it. It seemed to him as if wings had grown, and it lifted the shepherd of the people.

From its sheath he drew his father's
spear,

heavy, great, and strong. No other Achaean

could brandish it; Achilles alone knew how to wield the Pelian ash, which Chiron had given to his dear father from the summit of Pelion, to be death to heroes.

Automedon and Alcimius busied themselves with the horses; they yoked them, set the beautiful collars around their necks, put the bits between their jaws, and stretched the reins back to the chariot's fitted rail.

Automedon took the bright, well-made whip in his hand and sprang upon the horses; behind him Achilles mounted, shining in his armor like the sun that never tires.

He called dreadfully to his father's
horses:

“Xanthus and Balius, far-famed children of Podarge, consider well how you may bring your charioteer back again into the ranks of the Danaans, when we have had our fill of war.
Do not leave him there dead, as you left Patroclus.”

The swift-footed horse beneath the yoke, Xanthus, bowed his head; and all his mane, falling from the collar, reached the ground beside the yoke.
The white-armed goddess Hera had given him a human voice, and he spoke:

“Even now we shall save you, mighty
Achilles;
but your day of death is near, and we are not to blame—it is the great god and powerful Fate.
Nor was it by our slowness or our carelessness that the Trojans stripped Patroclus’s armor from his shoulders; but the best of the gods, whom fair-haired Leto bore, killed him among the foremost fighters and gave glory to Hector.
“We two could run even with the breath of Zephyr, which they say is the lightest of
winds;
but it is appointed for you yourself to be subdued by a god and by a
man.”

When he had spoken, the Erinyes stopped his voice.

Swift-footed Achilles answered him in deep displeasure:

“Xanthus, why do you prophesy death to me?

It is not your task. I know it myself very well:

it is my fate to perish here, far from my dear father and mother.

Yet even so I will not cease until I have driven the Trojans to the full measure of war.”

So he spoke, and shouting among the foremost ranks,

he held the single-hoofed horses.

Source range: Book 19. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 20

First-pass working translation

So they armed themselves beside the curved ships,
the Achaeans gathered around you,
son of Peleus,
insatiable of battle; while the Trojans again came on, leaping out upon the rising plain.
Then Zeus commanded Themis to summon the gods to assembly from many-folded Olympus.
She went everywhere and called them to the house of Zeus.
No river was absent, except Oceanus; nor any nymph who dwells in beautiful groves, beside the springs of rivers and in the grassy meadows.
They came to the house of cloud-gathering Zeus and sat in the polished halls which Hephaestus,
working with knowing thought, had made for his father.
All the gods gathered within Zeus's
house;
nor did the Earth-Shaker fail to hear the goddess's summons.
He came from the sea, sat in their midst, and questioned Zeus about his purpose:
"Why have you called the gods again to assembly, lord of the bright lightning? Are you pondering something concerning Trojans and Achaeans?

For now the battle and the war burn nearest them."
Cloud-gathering Zeus answered him:
"You know my thought already,
Earth-Shaker, and why I have gathered you. I care for them, though they are perishing.
But I shall remain here, seated in a fold of Olympus, where I may delight my spirit as I watch.
You others go, until you come among Trojans and Achaeans, and help whichever side each of you favors.
"For if Achilles alone fights against
the Trojans, they will not hold even for a little while against swift-footed Peleus's son.
Even before now they trembled at the sight of him; but now, since he is fiercely enraged for his companion, I fear he may destroy the wall beyond what is fated."
So spoke the son of Cronus, and roused a battle without restraint.
The gods went to war, divided in their hearts.
Hera went with the assembly of the
ships,
and Pallas Athena, and Poseidon, lord who holds the earth, and gracious Hermes, eminent in prudent thought;
and Hephaestus went with them, blazing in strength, limping, his thin legs moving beneath him.

To the Trojans went Ares of the shining helmet, and Phoebus with unshorn hair, and Artemis the archer, Leto, Xanthus, and Aphrodite who loves laughter.
While the gods remained apart from
mortal men, the Achaeans exulted greatly because Achilles had appeared, after a long pause from the grievous
battle;
but terrible trembling entered every Trojan limb, when they saw swift-footed Peleus's
son shining in his armor, like Ares who destroys men.
When the Olympians came among the host of men, strong, man-driving Strife rose up; Athena stood now beside the dug trench outside the wall, now upon the resounding shore and cried aloud.
Ares shouted from the other side, like a dark storm, calling the Trojans from the city's height, and at times running beside the Simois upon Callicolone.
So the blessed gods urged on both armies, and drove them together; among themselves they broke open a heavy, bitter quarrel.
The father of gods and men thundered terribly from above; and below, Poseidon shook the boundless earth and the steep heads of the mountains.

All the feet and summits of Ida with its many springs trembled, and the city of the Trojans and the ships of the Achaeans.
The lord of the dead beneath the earth was afraid.
In fear he leaped from his throne and cried out, lest Poseidon, the Earth-Shaker, split the ground above him, and reveal to mortals and immortals alike
his dreadful, moldering dwellings, which even the gods hate to behold.
So great was the uproar when the gods met in strife.
Phoebus Apollo stood face to face with lord Poseidon, holding his winged arrows; and the gray-eyed goddess Athena stood opposite Enyalios, Ares.
The loud, golden-bowed archer Artemis, sister of the Far-Shooter, stood against Hera; Hermes, gracious and strong, stood against Leto; and the great deep-eddying river, whom the gods call Xanthus and men call Scamander, stood against Hephaestus.
Thus the gods went against gods. But Achilles longed above all to enter the crowd against Hector, son of Priam;
his spirit commanded him to sate Ares, the shield-bearing warrior, with Hector's blood.

Apollo, driver of armies, roused Aeneas straight against him, and breathed good courage into his
heart.
He made himself like Lycaon, son of Priam,
and in his likeness, Apollo the son of Zeus spoke to Aeneas: "Aeneas, counselor of the Trojans, where are the threats you promised the kings of Troy while drinking wine—that you would fight Achilles, son of Peleus, face to face?"
Aeneas answered him:
"Son of Priam, why do you command me to do this, though I do not wish to fight face to face with the overbearing son of Peleus?
This is not the first time I shall stand against swift Achilles; before this he drove me away with his spear from Ida, when he came against our cattle, sacked Lyrnessus and Pedasus.
But Zeus saved me then, who roused my strength and gave speed to my knees.
I should have fallen beneath the hands of Achilles and Athena, who went before him, setting light in his path and commanding him to kill Leleges and Trojans with bronze.
"No man can fight Achilles face to face;
for a god is always beside him to ward off ruin.

And even otherwise his straight-flying spear does not stop until it has passed through a man's flesh.
If a god made the end of battle equal, he would not easily overcome me, not even if he boasts that he is all bronze."
Apollo, son of Zeus, answered him:
"Hero, pray also to the everlasting
gods;
they say that you too were born of Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, while he is born of a lesser goddess—she from Zeus, you from the old man of the sea.
Carry the unwearied bronze straight against him;
do not let pitiful words or threats turn you back."
So speaking, he breathed great courage into the shepherd of the people.
Aeneas went through the first ranks, armed in flashing bronze.
White-armed Hera saw the son of Anchises going straight against the son of Peleus through the ranks of men.
She halted the gods apart and spoke among them:
"Consider this in your minds, Poseidon and Athena, how these things shall be accomplished.
There is Aeneas, armed in flashing
bronze,
going against the son of Peleus; Phoebus Apollo has driven him.

Come, let us turn him back from the place; or let one of us stand beside Achilles, give him great strength, and let nothing fail him, that he may know how the best of the immortals love him, and how empty are those who have defended the Trojans and their battle before this.
“All of us came down from Olympus to this battle, that he might suffer no harm today
among the Trojans.
His fate will later bring him whatever he must endure, when his mother bore him and spun his thread.
If Achilles does not learn these things from the voice of the gods, he will fear afterward whenever a god comes face to face with him in battle, for the gods are terrible when they appear clearly.”
The Earth-Shaker Poseidon
answered: “Hera, do not be angry beyond measure; it is not fitting.
I would not wish to drive the other gods into strife, when we are much stronger than
they.
Let us go and sit apart, withdrawing from the battle;
let war concern the men.
But if Ares or Apollo begins the
fight, or holds Achilles back and will not let him fight,

then a quarrel will rise among us at once.
I think we shall quickly break apart and return to Olympus, subdued by our own hands.”
So speaking, the dark-haired god led them to the high, sea-washed wall of divine Heracles, which the Trojans and Pallas Athena had built for him, that he might escape the sea-monster whenever it drove him from the shore toward the plain.
There Poseidon sat, and the other gods with him; around their shoulders they wrapped an unbreakable cloud.
On the other side, upon the heights of Callicolone, sat Phoebus and city-sacking Ares, each devising counsel.
Thus they sat on either side, devising plans,
and both hesitated to begin the painful battle;
while Zeus, seated high above,
commanded them.
The whole plain was filled and flashed with bronze, with men and horses; the earth rang beneath their feet.
Two men, far the best, came eagerly into the space between them, desiring to fight: Aeneas, son of Anchises,
and divine Achilles.
Aeneas came first, threatening, nodding beneath his heavy helmet; before his breast he held his sturdy
shield,

and brandished his bronze spear.
From the other side Peleus's son came against him like a lion, a ravager whom all the gathered country people desire to kill.
At first he goes on, despising them; but when one of the bold, war-loving young men—
—and is struck by the spear, and falls back, foaming at the mouth; his brave heart groans within him, and he lashes his flanks and both his thighs with his tail, driving himself toward battle; his green eyes fixed straight ahead, he rushes on in strength, whether he kills some man or is himself the first to perish.
So courage and his proud spirit drove Achilles to meet great-hearted Aeneas.
When they came near one another, swift-footed divine Achilles spoke
first: “Aeneas, why have you come so far through the crowd and stood here?
Does your spirit command you to fight me, hoping to rule the horse-taming Trojans in Priam's honor?
Yet if you should kill me, Priam would not place that prize in your
hands;
he has sons of his own, and his mind is sound, not foolish.
Or have the Trojans cut out for you, apart from all the others, a beautiful estate of vineyard and plowland,

that you may possess it if you kill
me?
But I think you will find that difficult.
“Before this, I say, I drove you away with my spear.
Do you not remember when you were alone among the cattle?
I chased you swiftly down from the mountains of Ida.
Then you never turned to face me as you fled;
from there you escaped to Lyrnessus, while I came after you with Athena and father Zeus, sacked
the city,
and carried away its women, taking the free day from them.
But Zeus and the other gods saved
you.
Now I do not think they will save you, whatever your heart supposes.
I tell you: go back into the crowd, and do not stand before me, before some evil reaches you. A fool learns only after the deed.”
Aeneas answered him: “Son of Peleus, do not think to frighten me with words as though I were a child; I know mockery and shameful speech as well.
We know one another's birth and have heard the famous words of mortal men about our fathers; but you have never seen mine, nor have I seen yours.
They say you are the blameless son of Peleus,

and of Thetis, the fair-haired sea-born goddess; while I declare myself the son of great-hearted Anchises, and Aphrodite is my mother.
Today the parents of one of us shall mourn a beloved son; we shall not go back from this battle as children after words.
“If you wish to learn our lineage, that you may know it well—many men know it already—then first cloud-gathering Zeus begot Dardanus, who founded Dardania, before holy Ilium, city of mortal men, had yet been built upon the plain; men still lived beneath the slopes of many-springed Ida.
“Dardanus begot Erichthonius, a
king, who became the richest of mortal
men.
Three thousand mares grazed for him in the marsh, rejoicing in their tender foals.
Boreas loved them as they grazed; he took the form of a dark-maned stallion and lay with them, and they conceived and bore twelve foals.
When they ran and leaped over the life-giving earth, they skimmed the tops of the grain-bearing stalks and did not break them; but when they ran and leaped upon the broad back of the sea, they skimmed the crest of the gray salt water.

“Erichthonius begot Tros, king of the Trojans;
and Tros had three blameless sons: Ilus, Assaracus, and godlike Ganymede, who was the most beautiful of all
mortal men.
The gods carried him away because of his beauty, that he might pour wine for the immortals.
Ilus begot the blameless Laomedon; Laomedon begot Tithonus, Priam, Lampos, Clytius, and Hicetaon, a branch of Ares.
Assaracus begot Capys, and Capys begot Anchises;
Anchises begot me, and Priam begot divine Hector.
This is the blood and lineage from which I claim descent.
“Zeus increases and diminishes a man’s strength as he wills, for he is the strongest of all.
But come, let us speak no longer like
children, standing here in the midst of the battle’s slaughter.
There are insults enough for either of us to speak, many indeed—no ship with a hundred benches could carry their burden.
The tongue of mortals is pliant, and there are many kinds of words within it, a wide pasture of speech in every direction.

Whatever word you speak, such a word you shall hear.

But what need have we to quarrel and accuse one another, face to face like women, who, angered by soul-consuming strife, go into the middle of the street and reproach one another, saying much that is true and much that is not?

Their anger makes them speak it. You will not turn me from my eager courage with words; not before we have fought face to face with bronze.

Come, let us quickly taste one another's strength with bronze-tipped spears."

So he spoke, and drove his mighty spear against the dreadful shield; the shield bellowed greatly beneath the spear's point.

But Peleus's son held the shield away with his broad hand, thinking that Aeneas's long-shadowed spear would easily pass through.

He was a fool; he did not understand in his heart that the glorious gifts of the gods are not easily broken or made to yield before mortal men. Yet the mighty spear of wise Aeneas did not break the shield.

Gold, the gift of the god, held it back.

It drove through two folds, while three still remained, since the crooked-footed smith had made five folds:

two of bronze, two within of tin, and the one of gold that stopped the ashen spear.

Achilles cast his long-shadowed spear in turn.

He struck Aeneas's perfectly rounded shield beneath the first rim, where the bronze was thinnest and the oxhide was thinnest as well. The Pelian ash pierced through, and the shield split beneath it.

Aeneas sprang back and lifted the shield from his body in fear.

The spear, driven onward, stood in the earth behind him; its point had passed through both circles of the mortal shield.

He avoided the long spear, but a boundless grief spread over his eyes, struck with terror when the weapon stood so near him. But Achilles, rushing upon him fiercely, drew his sharp sword and cried aloud.

Aeneas seized a great stone in his hand, a mighty deed, such as two men of this present generation could not carry together; but he wielded it easily alone.

There Aeneas would have hurled the stone and struck either the helmet or the shield that had held off his grievous destruction; and Peleus's son, rushing close, would have taken his life with the

sword,
had not Poseidon, the Earth-Shaker, perceived it quickly.
He spoke among the immortal gods:
"Ah me, I grieve for great-hearted Aeneas,
who soon, subdued by Peleus's son, will go down to Hades, obeying Apollo the Far-Shooter—a fool, since Apollo will not save him from grievous death.
Why should this guiltless man suffer pain for nothing, on account of another's grief, while he continually offers pleasing gifts to the gods who hold the wide heaven?
Come, let us draw him away from
death,
lest the son of Cronus grow angry if Achilles kills him.
It is his destiny to escape, so that the race of Dardanus may not perish seedless and vanish altogether—Dardanus, whom the son of Cronus loved above all the children born to him from mortal women.
For the son of Cronus has come to hate the house of Priam; but now the strength of Aeneas shall rule the Trojans, and the children of his children who are born afterward." Ox-eyed, honored Hera answered
him:
"Earth-Shaker, consider in your own spirit

whether you will rescue Aeneas, or leave him, excellent though he is, to be subdued by Achilles, son of Peleus.
I and Pallas Athena have sworn many oaths before all the immortals never to defend the Trojans from the evil day—not even when all Troy burns in consuming fire and the warlike sons of the Achaeans set it ablaze."
When Poseidon, Earth-Shaker, heard
her, he went through the battle and the clash of spears, and came to the place where Aeneas and glorious Achilles stood.
At once he spread a mist before the eyes of Achilles, and drew the bronze spear from the shield of great-hearted Aeneas.
He laid it before Achilles's feet, and lifted Aeneas from the ground into the air.
Across many ranks of heroes, across many ranks of horses, Aeneas leaped by the god's hand, and came to the far edge of the tumultuous battle, where the Cauconians stood armed
for war.
Poseidon, Earth-Shaker, came close and spoke to him:
"Aeneas, what god commands you, in your blindness, to fight face to face with the overbearing son of Peleus?

He is stronger than you, and dearer to the immortals.
Withdraw whenever you meet him, lest you go to the house of Hades beyond your portion.
But when Achilles has met death and
fate, then fight boldly among the
foremost ranks;
for no other Achaeans will kill you.” So speaking, he left him there, since he had made all clear.
At once he scattered the divine mist from Achilles’s eyes.
Achilles looked around and saw with his own eyes, troubled, and spoke within his great
heart:
“Ah me, what great wonder do I see with my eyes?
My spear lies here upon the ground, but I see no man at whom I hurled it in my fury.
So Aeneas too must be dear to the immortal gods;
and I thought his boasts were empty wind.
Away with him! His spirit shall not try me again, since he has gladly escaped death.
Come, I will command the war-loving Danaans, and go against the other Trojans.” So he spoke, and leaped upon the
ranks,
calling to every man: “No longer stand far off from the Trojans, divine Achaeans; let man go against man, and let each desire to fight.

It is hard for me, mighty though I am, to pursue so many men and fight
them all.
Not even Ares, an immortal god, or Athena could pursue the mouth of so great a battle
and labor through it.
But whatever strength I have in hands and feet and courage, I declare that I will not hold back even for a little; I will go straight
through the ranks,
and I think no Trojan will rejoice who comes within reach of my
spear.”
Thus he urged them on. On the Trojan side glorious Hector called aloud and commanded them to go against Achilles: “High-hearted Trojans, do not fear Peleus’s son.
I could fight even with words against the immortals, but with the spear it is hard, for they are far stronger.
Nor will Achilles bring every word to fulfillment;
one thing he will accomplish, another he will cut short halfway.
I will go against him, even if his hands are like fire, and his strength like burning iron.” So he urged them on; and the Trojans lifted their spears against
him, their strength mingled, and the war-cry rose.

Then Phoebus Apollo, standing beside Hector, spoke: “Hector, no longer fight Achilles in the first ranks.
Receive him among the multitude, away from the tumult; lest he strike you with a spear or wound you at close quarters.” So he spoke; and Hector again entered the ranks of men, afraid when he heard the voice of the god.
But Achilles leaped among the
Trojans,
clothed in courage, and cried aloud.
First he took Iphition, son of Otrynteus,
a good leader of many people.
A water-nymph had borne him to Otrynteus,
the sacker of cities, beneath snowy Tmolus,
in the rich land of Hyde.
Divine Achilles struck him straight through the middle of the head with his spear; the skull split cleanly in two,
and he fell with a crash.
Then divine Achilles boasted over
him:
“There you lie, son of Otrynteus, most terrible of all men.
Here is your death; your father’s estate is beside Lake Gygaea, where you have a paternal holding, by fish-filled Hyllus and the swirling Hermus.”
So he boasted; and darkness covered the man’s eyes.

The horses of the Achaeans tore him
apart with their wheels in the first line of
battle.
Then Achilles struck Demoleon, son of Antenor, a good defender in war, beneath the temple,
driving the spear through the bronze cheek-piece of his helmet.
The bronze helmet did not stop it; the spear passed through, shattered the bone, and all the brain was spattered within him.
He subdued the man as he rushed against him.
Then he struck Hippodamas, who sprang from his horses and fled before him, in the back with
his spear.
He gave up his spirit and roared like a bull
when young men drag it around the lord of Helicon;
the Earth-Shaker delights in the sound.
So the brave spirit left that man as he roared,
and his bones remained behind.
Then he went with his spear against godlike Polydorus, son of Priam. His father would not let him fight, because he was the youngest of all his children,
and dearest to him; in the folly of youth he surpassed them all in speed of foot.

Then he rushed among the foremost ranks, displaying his childish swiftness, until he lost the life he loved.
Swift-footed divine Achilles struck him in the middle of his back as he ran past, where the golden fastenings of his belt held him, and the doubled corselet met.
The spear-point came straight through beside the navel.
He fell upon his knees with a cry, and a dark cloud covered him; he crouched toward the earth, holding his entrails in his hands.
When Hector saw his brother Polydorus lying upon the earth and clutching his entrails, a mist spread over his eyes.
He could not bear to remain far off any longer, but came straight against Achilles, shaking his sharp spear, like a flame.
When Achilles saw him, he sprang forward and spoke in triumph:
“The man is near who has struck my heart most deeply, who killed my honored companion. We shall not shrink from one another any longer through the paths of war.”
He looked darkly at divine Hector and called:
“Come nearer, that you may reach the limits of death more quickly.” Hector, not afraid, answered him: “Son of Peleus, do not expect to frighten me with words as though I were a child. I know mockery and shameful speech as well as you do. I know that you are a good man, and that I am far worse than you.

Yet these things lie upon the knees of the gods.
Perhaps, though I am the weaker, I may take your life by striking you with my spear; for my weapon too has been sharp before.”
So speaking, he cast his spear; but Athena turned it back with a breath from glorious Achilles, blowing upon it very softly.
The spear came back to divine Hector and fell before his feet.
Achilles rushed forward fiercely, eager to kill him, crying aloud; but Apollo snatched Hector away easily, like a god, and hid him in thick mist.
Three times swift-footed divine Achilles sprang with his bronze spear; three times he struck the deep mist.
But when he rushed a fourth time, equal to a spirit, he shouted terribly and spoke winged words: “Again you have escaped death, dog! Surely evil came near you; but Phoebus Apollo has saved you once more, to whom you must pray when you go into the clash of spears. I shall certainly finish you later, when we meet again—if some god stands beside me as well.

Now I will go after the others, whoever comes within my reach.” So speaking, he struck Dryops in the middle of the neck with his spear, and Dryops fell before his feet.
Achilles left him there and caught Demouchus, son of Philetor, strong and great, striking him in the knee with his spear and holding him back; then he took his life with his great
sword.
Next he rushed upon Laogonus and Dardanus, both sons of Bias, and drove them from their horses, throwing one to the ground with his
spear,
and striking the other at close quarters with his sword.
Then Tros, son of Alastor, came straight to his knees, hoping he might take hold of them and be spared, and that Achilles, pitying a man of his own age, would not kill him.
Fool! He did not understand what he was about to suffer.
Achilles was not gentle-hearted or merciful, but terribly enraged.
While Tros touched his knees and begged, Achilles struck him with the sword in the liver.

The liver slipped out; dark blood filled his lap, and darkness covered his eyes as his spirit failed.
Then Achilles, standing near, struck Mulius with his spear beneath the ear; the bronze point passed at once through the other ear.
Then he struck Echeclus, son of Agenor,
in the middle of the head with the sword's hilt.
The whole sword grew warm with
blood,
and purple death and powerful fate seized his eyes.
Then he struck Deucalion, where the tendons
hold the elbow together, and pierced his arm with the bronze point through the flesh.
He stood before him, his arm grown heavy, looking upon death; but Achilles laid the sword upon his neck and sent his head far
away
with the helmet still upon it.
The marrow leaped from the vertebrae, and he lay stretched upon the earth.
Then Achilles went against Rigmus, son of Peireus, who had come from rich-soiled Thrace.
He struck him in the middle with the
spear;
the bronze fixed itself in his belly, and he fell from the chariot.

Then he struck his charioteer Arēithoön, who had turned the horses back, in the back with his sharp spear, and drove him from the car; his horses were thrown into confusion.
As a fire, divinely sent, rages in the deep valleys of a parched mountain, and the deep forest burns, while the wind drives the flame in every direction—so he rushed everywhere, equal to a spirit, following those he killed with his
spear;
and the black earth ran with blood.
As when a man yokes broad-browed oxen to tread white barley in a well-built threshing floor, and the small grains quickly come loose beneath the bellowing oxen's feet—so beneath great-hearted Achilles the single-hoofed horses trampled corpses and shields together; all beneath the axle and the rims around the chariot were spattered with blood, from the horses' hooves and from the wheels.
But the son of Peleus longed to win
glory,
and his invincible hands were stained with gore.

Source range: Book 20. Full-book provisional draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 21

First-pass working translation

When they reached the ford of the fair-flowing river, the whirling Xanthus, whom immortal Zeus had fathered, Achilles cut some of them apart and drove them toward the plain, toward the city where the Achaeans had fled in terror the day before, when glorious Hector raged among them.
They poured forward in flight; Hera spread a deep darkness before them, and half of them were driven into the silver-whirling river.
They fell with a great crash; the steep banks roared around them, and the men swam here and there, whirling in the eddies with a cry.
As when locusts flee before a blast of fire toward a river, while the tireless flame rushes suddenly upon them, and they cower beneath the water—so beneath Achilles the deep-whirling Xanthus was filled with the mingled stream of horses and men.
The son of Peleus, born of Zeus, left
his spear
leaning against a tamarisk upon the bank;
he leaped into the river like a god, carrying only his sword, and planned evil in his heart. He struck men down, turning from side to side; and an unlovely groan rose from those he cut, while the water grew red with blood.

As fish flee a great sea-beast and fill the hidden corners of a well-sheltered harbor, terrified—for it devours whatever it can seize—so the Trojans cowered beneath the dreadful river's banks, while Achilles,
when his hands grew weary of killing, chose twelve living youths from the stream as payment for Patroclus, son of Menoetius, who had died.
He led them out of the river, stunned like fawns, bound their hands behind them with well-cut straps, the straps they themselves wore upon their folded tunics, and gave them to his companions to lead down to the hollow ships.
But he himself sprang back, eager to destroy.
There he met the son of Priam, the Dardanian Lycaon, fleeing from the river—him whom Achilles himself had once led away captive from his father's orchard, coming upon him by night while he cut young branches from a fig tree with sharp bronze to make the rails of a chariot.
An unforeseen evil then came upon divine Achilles.

He carried Lycaon through the well-built Lemnos and sold him there; the son of Jason paid the price.
But a guest-friend, Eetion of Imbros, freed him for much, and sent him to sacred Arisbe; from there he escaped and came to his father's house.
Eleven days he delighted his heart among his dear ones after returning from Lemnos; but on the twelfth a god cast him again into the hands of Achilles, who was destined to send him unwillingly to Hades.
When swift-footed divine Achilles saw him, naked, without helmet or shield, and carrying no spear—he had thrown all these aside, for sweat and weariness from his flight out of the river weighed upon his knees—Achilles, troubled, spoke within his great heart:
“What a wonder I behold with my eyes!
Will the great-hearted Trojans whom I have killed rise again from the mist and darkness, as this man has come back from Lemnos, having crossed the kindly sea—though the sea's gray surface holds back many men against their will?

Come, let him taste the point of my
spear,
that I may see and learn in my heart whether he will return from there as well, or whether the life-giving earth will hold him, though it holds even the strong.” While he waited, Lycaon came close, eager to seize Achilles's knees and escape
the evil death and black fate.
Divine Achilles raised his long spear, eager to strike; but Lycaon ran beneath it, bent down, and grasped his knees.
The spear stood quivering in the earth behind him, thirsting to drink the blood of a man.
With one hand he clasped Achilles's knees in supplication; with the other he held the sharpened spear and would not release it.
He spoke in winged words: “I clasp your knees, Achilles; respect me and pity me.
I come before you as a suppliant, fostered by Zeus.
With you I first ate the fruit of Demeter's field on the day you captured me in the well-built orchard, and led me away from my father and
my friends to sacred Lemnos, where you sold me for a hundred oxen.
Now I have paid three times that price, and this is the twelfth dawn since I came to Ilium after enduring much; now evil fate has placed me again in your hands. I must be hated by father Zeus, who has given me to you a second time.

My mother is Laothoe, daughter of old Altes, who rules the war-loving Leleges and holds steep Pedasus beside the Satnioeis.
Priam took her as a wife, among his many wives;
we were two sons born of her, and you will cut the throats of both—you subdued godlike Polydorus in the first ranks when you struck him with your sharp
spear,
and now evil will come upon me
here.
I do not think I shall escape your
hands, since a god has brought me near
them.
But I will tell you another thing, and lay it up in your heart: do not kill me. I am not Hector's full brother, who killed your gentle and strong
companion."
So the glorious son of Priam spoke, entreating him;
but he heard a voice that would not yield:
"Fool, do not speak to me of ransom or make speeches.
Before Patroclus met his appointed day, it was more pleasing to my heart to spare Trojans, and I captured many alive and sold them beyond the sea.

But now no Trojan shall escape
death,
whom a god casts before my hands here before Ilium—not one of all the Trojans, and least of all a son of Priam.
Die, my friend. Why do you mourn so?
Patroclus died too, though he was far better than you.
Do you not see how great and beautiful I am?
I am the son of a noble father, and a goddess bore me;
yet death and powerful fate stand over me as well.
There shall come a dawn, an evening, or a noon, when some man will take my life in
battle, striking with his spear or an arrow from the bow."
So he spoke; and Lycaon's knees and dear heart were loosened.
He let go the spear, and sat with both hands spread.
Achilles drew his sharp sword and struck him beside the neck, driving the double-edged blade wholly inward.
He fell face down, stretched upon
the earth;
black blood ran from him and wet
the ground.
Achilles seized him by the foot and cast him into the river, and spoke over him in triumph: “Lie there among the fish; let them lick the blood from your wound without care. Your mother will not lay you upon a bier and mourn you; the whirling Scamander will carry you into the broad gulf of the sea.

Some fish will leap through the black wave and gnaw the shining fat of Lycaon.
Perish, until we reach the holy city of Ilium—
you fleeing, and I destroying behind
you.
Nor will the river, though fair-flowing and silver-whirling, save you, to which for so long you have sacrificed many bulls and cast living single-hoofed horses into the eddies.
Even so you shall die an evil death, until all of you have paid for Patroclus’s death and for the ruin of the Achaeans, whom you killed beside the swift ships while I was away.” Thus he spoke; and the River grew yet more angered within his heart, and pondered how to make the godlike Achilles cease from his labor, and ward from the Trojans the doom that followed. Meanwhile the son of Peleus, holding his long-shadowed spear, sprang upon Asteropaeus, the son of Pelegon, resolved in his heart to slay him.

Pelegon was born of the wide-flowing Axios and Periboea, eldest daughter of Acessamenus; with her the deep-eddying River had mingled.
Against him Achilles rushed; but he stood forth from the River, holding two spears, for Xanthus had set courage within him, angered at the young men slain, whom Achilles butchered along his stream and pitied not.
When they had come near, swift-footed, shining Achilles spoke before him:
“Who are you, and from what people, that you have dared to come against me? Unhappy are the children of those men who meet my strength in battle.” Then the glorious son of Pelegon
answered him: “Great-hearted son of Peleus, why do you question my lineage?
I come from fertile Paeonia, far
away, leading the long-speared Paeonians; and this is the eleventh dawn since I came to Ilium. But my blood is from the Axios, the broad-flowing Axios, whose waters are fairest of all that he sends across the earth; he begot the famous spearman Pelegon, and Pelegon, men say, begot me. Now, glorious Achilles, let us fight.”

He spoke, and threatened him. Then shining Achilles lifted the Pelian ash; but Asteropaeus, being ambidextrous, cast both his spears together. With one he struck the shield, but could not pierce it through, for the god's gold gifts held it fast. With the other he struck the right forearm, slanting above the elbow; and the dark blood sprang forth.
The spear stood fixed in the earth beyond him, longing to drink his flesh. Then Achilles, in his turn, sent forth the straight-pointed ash, eager to kill him; but he missed, and the spear struck the lofty bank, where it stood driven halfway through the river-cliff.
The son of Peleus drew the sharp sword from beside his thigh and leapt upon him, fierce to strike.
Asteropaeus could not with his broad hand wrench Achilles' ash from the steep bank.
Three times he shook and strained to tear it free; three times the strength failed and his arms released it; the fourth time he bent his heart to break and bow the ash-spear of Aeacus' son. But before that could be done, Achilles came close and robbed him of his life.
He struck him in the belly beside the navel,

and all his entrails spilled out upon
the ground;
darkness covered his eyes as he gasped for breath.
Achilles sprang upon his breast, stripped away his armor, and, exulting, spoke this word:
"Lie there so. It is hard to contend with the sons of mighty Cronus, even when one is born from a river.
You said that you were sprung from a wide-flowing River; but I proclaim my lineage from great Zeus.
My father was a man who ruled over many Myrmidons, Peleus, son of Aeacus; and Aeacus was born from Zeus.
Zeus is mightier than rivers flowing into the salt sea, and the offspring of Zeus is mightier than a river's child.
For you have beside you a great River, if he can help you; but there is no fighting Zeus, the son of Cronus.
Not even lordly Achelous can equal him in strength, nor Oceanus, deep-flowing and mighty, from whom all rivers, every sea, every spring, and every deep well are born.
Yet even Oceanus fears the thunderbolt of great Zeus and the terrible thunder, when it crashes down from heaven."
So he spoke, and drew the bronze spear from the steep bank; but left the other there, since he had taken away his life.

He lay upon the sands, and the black water drenched him.

Eels and fish gathered around him, gnawing the flesh, and cropping the fat that lay along his kidneys.

Achilles went on against the Paeonians, horse-crested, who still remained beside the whirling River, terrified when they saw their best man overcome by the hands of Peleus' son and by his mighty sword.

There he seized Thersilochus, Mydon, and Astypylus, Mneseus, Thrasios, Aenius, and Ophelestes—and the Paeonian ranks were broken before him.

And now swift Achilles would have slain still more of the Paeonians, had not the deep-eddying River, appearing in the likeness of a man and speaking from his deep whirl, addressed him in anger:

"Achilles, you surpass in strength, and you do deeds beyond all measure against men; for the gods themselves are ever your defenders.

If the son of Cronus has granted you all the Trojans to destroy, drive them from me at least, and do your dreadful work upon the plain; for my lovely channels are already filled with corpses, and I can find no way to pour my stream into the bright sea, so choked am I with the dead, while you kill without pity.

Come now, desist; dread seizes me,
shepherd of the people."

Swift-footed Achilles answered him:
"It shall be so, Zeus-nurtured Scamander, as you command; but I will not cease from slaughtering the overweening Trojans until I have driven them beneath their city and tried my strength against Hector face to face—whether he shall master me, or I shall master him."

So he spoke, and like a god sprang upon the Trojans.

Then the deep-eddying River addressed Apollo:

"Ah me, god of the silver bow, son of Zeus!

You have not kept the commands of Cronus's son, who charged you earnestly to stand beside the Trojans and guard them, until the late-setting sun should come, and darkness cover the fertile fields."

He spoke; and Achilles, famous for his spear, leapt from the river-bank into the midst of the stream.

But the River rushed upon him, raging and swelling; he stirred all his channels into confusion, pushed onward the many corpses that lay thick about him—those whom Achilles had slain—and cast them out upon the dry land, bellowing like a bull; but the living he saved within his beautiful channels, hiding them in deep,

great whirlpools.
Around Achilles stood a terrible wave, tossed and seething; the stream fell upon his shield. He could no longer stand firm upon his feet. With both hands he grasped a great and flourishing elm; but it fell from its roots, and in its fall drove down the whole steep bank, and checked the lovely channels with its thick branches, bridging them as it plunged inward.
Achilles sprang out of the whirl and fled across the plain on swift feet, in fear; yet the great god did not cease, but rose against him, dark-crested, that he might make the godlike Achilles desist from his labor and ward the doom from Troy.
The son of Peleus leapt as far as a black hunting eagle, the strongest and swiftest of winged creatures, launches itself; so he flew, and the bronze upon his breast rang terribly. Beneath him he turned aside and fled, while the River followed behind with mighty uproar.

As when a man who leads water from a dark spring guides its running course among the plants and gardens, holding a mattock in his hands and casting the barriers from the channel; while the stones are all upheaved beneath the water rushing forth, and the stream, descending swiftly, gurgles through the hollow land, and outruns even the guide—so always the wave of the River overtook swift-footed Achilles.
For the gods are stronger than men.
As often as shining, swift-footed Achilles tried to stand against it and discover whether all the immortals, who possess the wide heaven, were driving him in fear, so often the great wave of the heaven-fed River struck him above the shoulders. He leapt high with his feet, his spirit in anguish; but the River, rushing beneath, struck at his knees and swept the dust from under his feet.
Then the son of Peleus groaned, looking into the wide heaven: “Father Zeus, how has no god stood beside me in pity to save me from the River?
Afterward let any other grief come.
No other one of the heavenly gods is so greatly to blame, but my dear mother, who charmed me with false words—she told me that beneath the wall of the armored Trojans I should perish by Apollo's flying arrows.

Would that Hector had slain me, who was bred here and was the best of men! Then a good man would have killed me, and a good man stripped my armor.
But now fate has decreed that I should be taken by a pitiless
death, caught in the great River, like a swineherd's boy whom a torrent sweeps away as he crosses it in winter."
So he spoke; and Poseidon and Athena came very swiftly near him, likened in form to mortal men. They took him by the hand and strengthened him with words.
Earth-shaking Poseidon began:
"Son of Peleus, do not fear so greatly, nor be afraid;
for we two are beside you, a strong defense among the gods, with Zeus's approval—myself and Pallas Athena.
It is not your fate to be overcome by this River;
he will soon grow quiet, and you yourself shall see it.
But we shall give you good counsel, if you will obey us: do not cease from the battle that lays men low until you have driven the Trojan host beneath
the renowned walls of Ilium, whoever escapes.

Then, when you have taken Hector's
life, go back again to the ships; and we grant you glory."
Having spoken thus, the two withdrew among the immortals.
Achilles went out upon the plain, compelled by the mighty command of the gods. All the plain was filled with water poured abroad; many fine weapons of the young men slain, and many corpses, floated upon it. Achilles leapt high above the rising stream and sprang straight against the current; the broad-flowing River could not hold him back, for Athena had given him great strength.
Nor did Scamander lay aside his own might. He was angered still more against Peleus's son, and lifted the wave of his current high; then he called aloud to Simoeis, his dear brother:
"Dear brother, let us both restrain this man's strength, since soon he will sack the great city
of Priam,
and the Trojans will not stand within the battle.
Come swiftly to my aid, and fill your channels
with water from your springs; stir up all your torrents; raise a mighty wave, and awaken a great uproar of trees and stones, that we may stop this savage man, who now prevails and is bent on being equal to the gods.

For I declare that neither his strength nor his beauty nor his bright armor shall help him—those armor-pieces will lie far below in the mud of the pool.
Himself I will wrap in sand, pouring about him an infinite mound; nor shall the Achaeans know to gather up his bones, so much ruin will I heap upon him.
There, too, his monument shall be made; he shall have no need of a mound-builder when the Achaeans bury him.”
So he spoke, and rushed upon Achilles, tossing high, roaring with foam and blood and corpses.
The purple wave of the heaven-fed River stood lifted, and swept away the son of Peleus.
Then white-armed Hera cried aloud, greatly afraid for Achilles, lest the deep-eddying River should carry him away.
At once she called to her own dear son, Hephaestus: “Rise, my lame-footed child.
Opposite you we have made the whirling Xanthus a match for
battle.
Come swiftly to his aid, and make a mighty flame appear.
But I will bring from the sea a bitter storm of the West Wind and the bright South Wind, and raise it terribly;

it shall burn the heads and armor of
the Trojans, carrying an evil blaze. You must burn the trees along the banks of Xanthus, and cast the fire into the River itself.
Do not let soft words or threats turn you aside;
do not cease from your strength until I cry aloud.
Then restrain your tireless fire.” So she spoke; and Hephaestus kindled the fire divine.
First the fire spread across the plain and burned the many corpses that lay thick around it, whom Achilles had slain; the whole plain was dried, and the bright water was held back.
As when the autumn North Wind quickly dries the newly watered garden, and the gardener rejoices, so the whole plain was dried, and the corpses burned; then Hephaestus turned his bright flame toward the River.
The elms and willows burned, and the tamarisks;
the lotus burned, and the rush and the sedge, which had grown in abundance around the River’s lovely banks.
Eels and fish were wearied, and the fish that leapt here and there through the fair channels, distressed by the breath of resourceful Hephaestus.

The River's strength was burning; he spoke and called by name:

"Hephaestus, no god can stand against you in contest, nor could I fight with you here, against this blazing fire.

Cease from the quarrel; and let glorious Achilles drive the Trojans from their city at once.

What have I to do with quarrel and with aid?"

He spoke, burning in the fire; and the lovely channels boiled.

As when a cauldron boils within, urged by a great fire, melting the fat of a tender, well-fed hog on every side, while the dry wood lies beneath it crackling, so his lovely channels were burned by fire, and the water boiled; he would not flow forward, but was held back, and the breath of thoughtful Hephaestus tormented him.

Then he addressed white-armed Hera with many winged words:

"Hera, why has your son afflicted my stream for the sake of others?

I am not so much to blame as all the others, all who bring aid to the Trojans.

Yet I will cease, if you command it; and let that other one cease also. I swear you this besides:

never again will I ward the evil day from the Trojans, not even when all Troy burns in ravening fire, and the warlike sons of the Achaeans set it ablaze."

When the white-armed goddess Hera heard him, she at once spoke to her own dear son, illustrious Hephaestus:

"Hephaestus, glorious child, hold back; for it is not fitting that an immortal god should scourge another so harshly for mortals."

So she spoke; and Hephaestus quenched the fire divine.

The lovely wave withdrew backward into its channels.

When the strength of Xanthus had been subdued, both ceased their struggle, for Hera, though still angry, held them back.

Among the other gods a heavy quarrel now arose; hard strife divided them, and their hearts were blown apart.

They fell together with a mighty crash, and the broad earth groaned; the great heaven rang around them. Zeus heard it, sitting upon Olympus, and his dear heart laughed for joy, when he saw the gods coming together in their strife.

They did not stand apart for long. Ares, the shield-piercer, began, and first sprang upon Athena with his bronze spear; he spoke a word of reproach:

"Why again, dog-faced one, do you drive the gods together in strife, with this unwearied boldness, while your great heart urges you on? Do you not remember when you stirred Diomedes, son of Tydeus, to wound me, and yourself took up his spear, and drove it straight at me, tearing my fair flesh?

Therefore I think I shall now make you pay for all you did.”

So he spoke, and struck the dread, tasselled aegis, which not even Zeus’s thunderbolt can conquer;

with his blood-stained, long spear Ares struck it.

But Athena drew back, and with her broad hand lifted a dark, rough, mighty stone that men of an earlier age had set there as a boundary of the fields.

With it she struck furious Ares upon the neck, and loosed his limbs. Seven acres covered him as he fell; the dust rose about his hair, and his armor clattered.

Pallas Athena laughed and, boasting over him, spoke:

“Fool! You have not yet learned how much stronger I claim to be, since you have matched your strength against mine.

So may you pay the Furies of your mother,

who, angered because you abandoned the Achaeans, now plots evil for you while you defend the overweening Trojans.

Thus long ago we should have ceased from battle

and sacked the well-built city of Ilium.”

So she spoke; and the white-armed goddess Hera smiled.

Then Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, took Ares by the hand, groaning heavily; and with difficulty he gathered back his spirit.

When white-armed Hera saw her, she at once spoke winged words to Athena, daughter of Zeus who bears the aegis:

“Ah me, child of the aegis-bearing Zeus, unwearied one!

There is that dog-faced woman leading the man-destroyer Ares away from the furious battle through the tumult.

Go after her.”

So she spoke; and Athena rushed after them, glad at heart.

She came close, and with her broad hand struck Aphrodite upon the breast; her knees and dear heart gave way.

Both lay together upon the earth that feeds all.

Then Athena, exulting, spoke these
winged words:

“Would that all who bring help to the Trojans were such whenever they fought the armored Argives—bold and enduring as Aphrodite was when she came to aid Ares, standing against my strength. Then long ago we should have ended the war and sacked the well-built city of Ilium.”

So she spoke; and the white-armed
goddess Hera smiled.
Then the mighty Earth-shaker addressed Phoebus Apollo: “Phoebus, why have we two held ourselves apart?
It is not fitting when others have begun.
It would be shameful if we went unchallenged back to Olympus, to the bronze-floored house of Zeus.
Begin, since you are younger; it would not be seemly for me, who was born first and know more than you.” But the far-shooting Apollo
answered him: “Earth-shaker, you would not call me sound-minded
if I should fight with you for the sake of pitiful mortals, who are like the leaves of trees: for a time they flourish, eating the fruit of the field, and for a time they wither, without strength. Let us quickly cease from battle;
let them fight among themselves.
“Have you forgotten all the evils we two suffered around Ilium, alone among the gods, when we came to proud Laomedon from Zeus and served him for a full year at a fixed wage, under whatever orders he gave? I built for the Trojans a wall around their city, broad and very fair, so that the city might be unbroken;
while you, Phoebus,

kept the long-horned, twisting-footed cattle of Laomedon in the folds of woody, many-ridged Ida.
But when the joyful seasons brought the wage due at last, then mighty Laomedon cheated us of all our payment, and sent us away with threats. He threatened to bind our hands and feet above us, and sell us beyond the distant islands; he boasted that he would cut the ears from both of us with bronze.
So we went back in anger, resentful of the wage which he had promised and did not fulfill.
And now you bring favor to his people, nor will you join us, that the overweening Trojans may perish utterly, with their children and their honored wives.”
Then lord Apollo, the far-shooter,
answered him:
“Earth-shaker, you would not call me sound-minded
if I should fight with you for the sake of mortals.
They are like leaves: one moment they burn with life, feeding upon the harvest of earth;
another they wither, without a heart. Let us quickly cease from battle;
let them fight among themselves.” So he spoke, and turned away; for he was ashamed to join battle with his father's brother in his hands.

His sister, the lady of the wild, Artemis, rebuked him sharply:
"You flee, far-shooter, and have given all the victory to Poseidon, granting him glory for nothing. Fool!
Why do you carry a useless bow? May I never hear you again boasting in our father's halls, as once you did among the immortal gods, that you would fight Poseidon face to face." So she spoke; but the far-shooter answered her nothing.
Then the revered wife of Zeus, angry, rebuked the archer goddess:
"How now? You shameless hound, do you intend to stand against me? Hard it is for you to match my strength, though you carry the bow; for Zeus has made you a lion among women, and granted you to kill whom you will.
Better it is to destroy wild beasts upon the mountains, and the forest deer, than to contend in strength with the stronger.
But if you wish to learn war, that you may know clearly how much stronger I am, since you match your strength against mine—"

So she spoke, and seized both her wrists in her left hand; with her right she took the bow from her shoulders.
With it she struck her about the ears, smiling,

as Artemis twisted to and fro; and the swift arrows fell.
Tearful, the goddess fled beneath her blows, as a dove, flying before a hawk, darts into a hollow rock; for it was not her fate to be taken. So she fled in tears and left her bow there upon the ground.
Then Hermes, the guide and slayer of Argus, addressed Leto:
"Leto, I will not fight with you; it is a hard thing
to box with the wives of Zeus, gatherer of the clouds.
But among the immortal gods, boast freely that you defeated me by your strong might."
So he spoke; and Leto gathered the curved bow and arrows, scattered here and there in the whirling dust,
and went back carrying them to her
daughter.
"Leto, I will not fight with you; it is a hard thing
to box with the wives of Zeus, gatherer of clouds.
But among the immortal gods, boast freely that you defeated me
by your strong might."
So he spoke; and Leto gathered the
curved bow and arrows,
scattered here and there in the
whirling dust,
and went back carrying them to her
daughter.
Artemis came to Olympus, to the bronze-floored house of Zeus; weeping, she sat upon her father's knees, and her ambrosial robe quivered around her. Her father, Cronus's son, took her close, smiling sweetly, and asked her:

"Who has done this to you, dear child, so rashly, as though you had been caught openly in some wrongdoing?" Then the fair-crowned, loud-voiced goddess answered him:
"Your wife, white-armed Hera, father, struck me;
from her arise the strife and quarrels among the immortals."
While they spoke thus together, Phoebus Apollo entered holy Ilium; for his thought was fixed upon the city's well-built wall, lest the Danaans should sack it on that day beyond its fate.
The other gods, who live forever, went back toward Olympus, some angry and some greatly exulting, and sat down beside their father, wrapped in dark cloud.
But Achilles kept killing the Trojans themselves, and their single-hoofed horses with them.
As when smoke rises to the wide heaven from a city burning, and the wrath of the gods has lifted it aloft, bringing toil to all and many sorrows upon the people, so Achilles brought toil and sorrow upon the Trojans.
The old king Priam stood upon the tower of the god, and saw enormous Achilles. Beneath him the Trojans were scattered in flight; no courage remained in them.

The old man groaned, descended from the tower, and urged the famous gatekeepers along the wall:
"Keep the gates open in your hands until the people reach the city in their flight; for Achilles is
near, driving them before him. Now I think evil will come upon us.
But when they have drawn breath together within the wall, close the strong-fitted doors again upon their sockets; I fear that this savage man may spring into the city." So he spoke; and they opened the gates and thrust back the bars.
The gates, thrown wide, made a light before them.
Then Apollo leapt out to meet them, to ward destruction from the Trojans.
The Trojans fled straight toward the city and the high wall, parched with thirst and thick with dust from the plain.
Achilles pursued them fiercely with
his spear;
violent fury held his heart, and he yearned to win the glory.
Then the sons of the Achaeans would have taken high-gated Troy, had not Phoebus Apollo stirred the noble Agenor,

the blameless, mighty son of Antenor.
Apollo cast courage into his heart, and stood beside him, leaning against a beech, and warding off the heavy hands of death; he hid him round about in a thick mist.
When Agenor saw Achilles, the sacker of cities, he stood still, and his heart beat hard as he waited.
Distressed, he spoke to his great-hearted spirit: “Woe is me! If I flee before mighty
Achilles,
where the others flee in terror, he will seize me even so and cut my throat, helpless as I am.
But if I leave these men to be driven and scatter from Achilles, and flee on foot from the wall toward the plain of Ilium, until I reach the lower slopes of Ida and enter the thickets, then at evening I could wash away my sweat in the River and return at nightfall to Ilium. But why has my dear spirit held this argument? He might see me leaving the city for the plain, and overtake me with his swift feet.
Then there would be no escape from death and destruction; for he is far stronger than all other
men.
“But if I go forth before the city and meet him face to face—his flesh too is vulnerable to the sharp bronze;

there is one life in him, and men say that he also is mortal.
Yet Zeus, the son of Cronus, grants him glory.”
So he spoke, and held his ground; and a bold heart rose within him to wage war and fight. As a leopard comes forth from the deep wood to face the hunter, and is not troubled or afraid when it hears the barking; for even if the hunter is first to wound or strike it, the beast, pierced around by the spear, does not cease from courage until it has met him or been subdued—so the noble son of Antenor,
godlike Agenor, would not flee before he had tried Achilles.
He held his shield, smooth on every side, before him, and aimed his spear at Achilles, crying loudly: “Surely in your heart you hope, glorious Achilles, to sack the city of the proud Trojans on this day—fool!
Many sorrows shall still be wrought around it.
Within it are many men, brave men, who defend Ilium before their dear fathers and mothers, their wives and children.
But here you shall meet your death, though you are a terrible and fearless warrior.”
So he spoke, and sent the sharp spear from his heavy hand;

he struck Achilles beneath the knee in the shin, and did not miss. The greave of newly wrought tin rang terribly around him; the bronze leapt back from the blow and did not pierce it, for the gifts of a god held it away.

Then the son of Peleus sprang upon Agenor, his equal in battle; but Apollo would not yet grant him the glory.

He snatched Agenor away, wrapped him in thick mist, and sent him quietly out of the war.
Then Apollo himself, the far-shooter, standing before Achilles, took the exact likeness of Agenor.

Achilles rushed after him, running at his feet, while Apollo led him away from the people, turning him beside the deep-eddying Scamander,

and running a little ahead of him. By his deceit Apollo charmed him, so that always he hoped to catch the man with his feet.

Meanwhile the other Trojans, escaping in fear, came gladly
together

to the city, and the city was filled with them.

They did not dare remain outside the city and the wall, to count one another and learn who had escaped and who had fallen in battle; but eagerly they poured into the city, each one whose feet and knees had saved him.

Source range: Book 21. Full-book provisional draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 22

First-pass working translation

So the Trojans, fleeing through the city, like young deer, leaned against the fair battlements, cooling their sweat, and drank away their thirst; while the Achaeans drew nearer to the wall, their shields slanted upon their shoulders.

But Hector was held there before the Scaean gates, by his ruinous fate, before the city of Ilium.

Then Phoebus Apollo spoke to the son of Peleus:

“Why do you pursue me with swift feet, son of Peleus, yourself a mortal, while I am an immortal god?

You have not yet recognized me as a god, though you rage on without rest. Do you care so little for the distress of the Trojans whom you routed, who have gathered into the city while you wandered here?

You shall not kill me, since death is not appointed for me.”

Swift-footed Achilles answered him in great anger:

“You have harmed me, far-shooter, most destructive of all the gods, turning me away from the wall; otherwise many Trojans would have bitten the earth before they reached Ilium.

Now you have robbed me of great glory, but saved them easily, since you feared no vengeance afterward. I would pay you back, if only I possessed the power.”

So he spoke, and with great thoughts turned toward the city, leaping forward like a racehorse that bears a prize-winning chariot, and runs easily, stretching itself across the plain.

So Achilles drove his swift feet and knees onward.

The old king Priam first saw him with his eyes, shining across the plain like the star that comes in autumn, whose rays stand conspicuous among the many stars in the dead darkness of night—the star they call the Dog of Orion. Brightest it is among the stars, yet it is made a baleful sign, and carries a great fever to suffering mortals. So the bronze flashed around Achilles’ breast as he ran.

The old man groaned, and struck his head with his hands, raising them high; loudly he cried and begged his dear son.

But Hector stood before the gates, unwearied, eager to meet Achilles in battle.

The old man stretched out his hands and spoke to him in pity:

“Hector, my dear child, do not wait for this man alone, apart from the others, lest you quickly meet your fate, overcome by the son of Peleus, since he is far stronger—that pitiless man. Would that he were as dear to the gods as he is to me! Then dogs and vultures would soon devour him as he lay dead; and bitter grief would leave my heart—he who has made me bereft of so many sons, brave men, killing them and selling them beyond the distant islands.

“Even now I cannot see two of my sons, Lycaon and Polydorus, among the Trojans gathered into the city—sons whom Laothoe, the lady among women, bore to me.
If they still live among the army, then we shall ransom them with bronze and gold; there is wealth within, for old Altes, famous by name, gave much of it to his child. But if they are already dead and within the house of Hades, there will be grief to my heart and to their mother, who bore them; but for the other people the grief will be shorter, unless you too are killed by Achilles.
“Come inside the wall, my child, that you may save the Trojan men and women; and do not grant great glory to the son of Peleus, while you yourself are deprived of your own beloved life. Have pity on me, unhappy as I am, while I still possess my mind—the doomed old man upon whom the son of Cronus has laid, at the threshold of old age, many cruel things to see: sons destroyed, daughters dragged away, bedchambers plundered, and little children thrown upon the ground in the hateful tumult; and daughters-in-law dragged away by the murderous hands of the Achaeans.

“And last of all, when someone has taken my life with sharp bronze, the ravening dogs will drag me before the first gates—those dogs I raised in my halls, guardians of the door and feeders at my table;
they will drink my blood and lie crazed around the vestibule.
For a young man slain and torn by sharp bronze,
all things are fitting, whatever appears before him; all is beautiful in death. But when dogs disgrace the gray head and gray beard of an old man slain, and dishonor the naked shame of an old man—that is the most pitiful thing for wretched mortals.”
So the old man spoke; and he tore the gray hairs from his head, plucking them with his hands. Yet he could not move Hector’s heart.
His mother, standing on the other side, poured out her tears, opened her breast, and lifted the other breast toward him.

She shed tears and spoke these
winged words: “Hector, my child, respect this and pity me, if ever I held out my comfort-giving breast to you.
Remember it, dear child, and defend yourself from that man within the wall; do not stand forth against him.
For if he kills you, I shall never again mourn you upon the bed, my beloved child whom I bore, nor shall your rich-gifted wife; but far from us, beside the ships of the Argives, swift dogs will devour you.” Thus the two, weeping, addressed their dear son, begging him at length; but they could not move Hector’s heart.
They wept and pleaded at length; but they could not move Hector’s heart.
He waited there for enormous Achilles as he drew near.
As a mountain serpent waits for a man beside its lair, having eaten evil herbs, and a dreadful anger enters it, while it watches terribly, coiling about its lair—so Hector, holding an anger that would not be quenched, did not withdraw, but leaned his shining shield against the projecting tower.
Distressed, he spoke to his great-hearted spirit: “Woe is me! If I enter through the gates and the wall, Polydamas will be the first to heap reproach upon me—he who urged me to lead the Trojans toward the city on this ruinous night, when noble Achilles rose.

But I would not listen; and it would have been far better.
Now I have destroyed the people through my own recklessness.
I am ashamed before the Trojans and the Trojan women, lest some lesser man than I should say hereafter: ‘Hector, trusting in his own strength, destroyed the army.’ “So they will speak. Then it would be far better for me either to meet Achilles face to face and kill him, or to perish before the city with honorable fame.
But what if I lay down my shield with its central boss, and my strong helmet, lean my spear against the wall, and go out myself to meet blameless
Achilles?
I would promise him Helen and all the possessions with her, all that Alexander brought home in the hollow ships when he carried her to Troy—the beginning of strife—to return to the sons of Atreus, and with them to divide among the other Achaeans all the treasures this city holds.

Then I would take from the Trojan elders a solemn oath to hide nothing, but to divide in two every possession that this lovely city encloses.
“But why has my dear spirit reasoned thus?
If I go to him, he will show me no mercy or respect; he will kill me naked, unarmed, as though I were a woman, once I have laid aside my armor.
There is no longer a way to converse beside an oak or a rock, as maiden and young man converse with one another. Better to drive the battle together as swiftly as we may, and learn to which of us the Olympian will grant the glory.” So he pondered, standing still; and Achilles came near, like Enyalios, the helmeted god of
war, shaking the Pelian ash above his right shoulder, while the bronze around his body flashed like the light of a burning fire or the rising sun.
When Hector saw him, trembling seized him; he could no longer endure to remain there, but left the gates behind in fear.
The son of Peleus rushed after him, trusting in his swift feet.
As a hawk, swiftest of winged creatures upon the mountains, easily launches after a trembling dove—the dove flees beneath him, while the hawk cries sharply and darts close again and again, its heart commanding it to seize her—so Achilles flew straight on in his fury, and Hector fled beneath the wall of Troy, driving his swift knees.

They passed the watchtower and the wind-bent fig tree, and sped continually along the wagon-road beneath the wall.
They reached the clear-flowing springs; and there two fountains leap up from the whirling Scamander.
One flows with warm water, and smoke rises from it as though from a burning fire; the other in summer pours forth like hail, or cold snow, or water frozen into crystal.
Beside these fountains lie broad washing-places, beautiful, made of stone, where the lovely wives and daughters of the Trojans once washed their shining garments, in the days of peace, before the sons of the Achaeans came.
Past these they ran: Hector fleeing
before,
and the great man pursuing behind,
swift-footed.
The noble one fled; the far greater pursued him eagerly.
For they did not race for a sacrificial beast or an ox-hide, such as men set up as prizes in their games; they ran for the life of Hector, breaker of horses.

As when swift-footed, prize-winning horses race around the turning-posts, and a great prize is laid there—a tripod or a woman, the prize for a man who has died—so the two of them circled the city of Priam three times upon their swift feet. All the gods watched them.
Then the father of men and gods began to speak among them: “Ah me! With my own eyes I behold the man I love pursued around the wall. My heart grieves for Hector,
who burned many ox-thighs for me upon the heights of Ida, rich in folds, and at other times in the highest city.
But now noble Achilles pursues him swiftly around the city of Priam. Come, gods, take counsel and consider:
shall we save him from death, or shall we now let the good man be mastered by Achilles, son of Peleus?”
Then the gray-eyed goddess Athena
answered him: “Father, hurler of the bright thunder, what is this you say?
Do you wish to loose a mortal man, long since marked by fate, back from harsh-sounding death? Do it; but all the other gods will not approve your deed.”

Cloud-gathering Zeus answered her: “Take courage, Tritogeneia, dear child. I do not speak with a willing heart, nor do I wish to be harsh toward you.
Do as your mind has determined; do not hold back.”
So he spoke, and urged Athena, already eager for the deed; she sprang down from the peaks of Olympus.
Swift Achilles pursued Hector
without rest,
as when a hound in the mountains chases a fawn, rousing it from its bed and driving it through ravines and valleys.
Even if the fawn slips beneath a bush and crouches, the hound runs on its scent until it finds the trail again; so Hector could not escape the swift-footed son of Peleus.
Whenever he tried to rush toward the Dardanian gates and the well-built towers, hoping the men above might shield him with their arrows, Achilles would always dart across before him and turn him back toward the plain, while himself he flew toward the city. As in a dream one cannot pursue a fugitive—neither can the one who flees escape, nor the pursuer catch him—so Hector could neither seize Achilles with his feet, nor Achilles escape from him.
How could Hector have escaped the black spirits of death, unless Apollo, for the final and last time, had come near him and stirred his courage and swift knees?

But noble Achilles shook his head toward his people and would not let them hurl their bitter arrows at Hector, lest someone else win the glory by striking him, and he himself arrive second.
When for the fourth time they reached the springs, the father stretched out the golden scales.
Within them he placed two spirits of
death,
bearing sorrow to its end: one for Achilles,
and one for Hector, breaker of
horses.
He lifted the scales by their middle;
and Hector's day of fate sank down.
He went away toward the house of Hades,
and Phoebus Apollo abandoned him.
Then the gray-eyed goddess Athena came to Achilles, stood close beside him, and spoke these winged words:
"Now, I think, beloved of Zeus, shining Achilles, we shall carry great glory to the Achaeans beside the ships, having slain Hector, insatiable as he is for battle.
There is no escape for him from us
now,
not even if far-shooting Apollo should suffer greatly, crawling in supplication before father Zeus who bears the aegis.

Stand here now and draw breath, while I go to him and persuade him to stand and fight you face to face."
So Athena spoke; and Achilles obeyed, glad in his heart.
He stood leaning upon his bronze-tipped ash spear.
She left him there, and reached noble
Hector, likened in form to Deiphobus, and possessing his unwearied voice.
She stood near him and spoke these winged words:
"My dear brother, surely swift Achilles presses you hard, pursuing you with swift feet around the city of Priam.
Come, let us stand and defend ourselves where we are."
Then great Hector, the flashing-helmeted warrior, answered
her:
"Deiphobus, before this you were by far the dearest of all the brothers whom Hecuba and Priam bore; but now I shall honor you even more in my heart, since you dared to come outside the wall for my sake, when the others remain within."
Gray-eyed Athena answered him:
"My dear brother, my father and honored mother pleaded with me at length, kneeling before me, and so did my companions, begging me to remain there—for all tremble before this man.

But my heart was worn down within by grievous sorrow.
Now let us go straight on, eager to fight; let no sparing of spears be made, so that we may learn whether Achilles will kill us both and carry our blood-stained armor to the hollow ships, or whether he will be mastered by your own spear.”
So she spoke, and by her cunning led him forward.
When they had come close, Hector, the great helmeted warrior, spoke first:
“I shall no longer fear you, son of Peleus, as before, when three times I fled around the great city of Priam, never daring to stand and await your coming. But now my heart has urged me to stand before you; I shall kill you, or be killed.
Come, let us call the gods to witness, for they are the best witnesses and guardians of our agreements.
I shall not outrage you terribly, if Zeus grants me strength and I take your life; but when I have stripped your famous armor, Achilles, I shall give your body back to the Achaeans.
Do the same for me.”
Swift-footed Achilles looked darkly at him and answered:

“Hector, do not speak to me, you hateful man, of agreements.
As there are no faithful oaths between lions and men, and wolves and lambs do not keep one mind toward one another, but think evil continually against each other,
so there can be no friendship between you and me, nor shall there be oaths between us, until one of us has fallen and glutted the steadfast warrior Ares with blood.
Remember now every kind of valor; for you must be a spearman and a fearless warrior today.
There is no escape for you; Pallas Athena will soon subdue you by my spear, and now you shall pay all together for the grief of my companions, whom you killed with your spear.” So he spoke, and hurled his long-shadowed spear.
Glorious Hector saw it coming and avoided it; he had crouched down before it, and the bronze spear flew over him and struck the ground. Athena snatched it up unseen by Hector, she gave it back to Achilles, and Hector, shepherd of the people, did not see her.
Then Hector spoke to the blameless
son of Peleus:
“You missed, Achilles, like a god, and you did not know from Zeus my fate—though you said so. You have proved a smooth-tongued cheat in words, hoping that I would fear you and forget my courage.

You shall not drive your spear into my back as I flee; drive it straight through my breast as I come against you, if the god has granted you that. Now in turn avoid my bronze spear; would that you might take the whole of it into your flesh!
The war would be lighter for the Trojans if you were dead, for you are their greatest affliction.”
So he spoke, and hurled his
long-shadowed spear;
it struck the middle of the son of Peleus’ shield and did not miss.
Far from the shield the spear sprang away; Hector was angered that the swift weapon had flown uselessly from his hand.
He stood there, downcast, and had no other ash spear.
He called aloud for Deiphobus of the white shield, asking him for a long spear; but Deiphobus was nowhere near him.
Then Hector knew within his heart, and spoke aloud:
“Ah me! The gods have surely called me to death.
I thought the hero Deiphobus stood beside me, but he is within the wall, and Athena has deceived me.
Now evil death is close to me, no longer far away;

and long ago it must have been dear to Zeus and the far-shooter, son of Zeus, who once defended me willingly.
But now fate has overtaken me. Let me not die without a struggle, without glory, but after doing some great deed, for those yet to come to know.” So he spoke, drew his sharp sword, which hung beneath his flank, great
and strong, and gathered himself like a high-flying eagle that plunges through the dark clouds upon the plain to seize a tender lamb or a crouching hare.
So Hector rushed, shaking his sharp
sword.
Achilles came against him, his spirit filled with savage fury.
Before his breast he held his beautiful, richly wrought shield; and upon his shining, four-plated helmet he nodded, while the lovely golden tassels streamed thickly around it—the plumes Hephaestus had set densely about the crest.
As the evening star goes among the stars in the darkness of night, and stands the fairest star in heaven, so flashed the point of the sharp spear Achilles brandished in his right hand, plotting evil for noble Hector,
as he searched his fair flesh to find where it would yield.

But all the rest of his body was held by the bronze armor, beautiful armor, which Hector stripped from Patroclus when he had killed him by force.
Only where the collarbones hold the neck from the shoulders, the throat, where the soul's destruction is swiftest—there the noble Achilles drove his spear upon Hector, as he rushed against him. The heavy ash passed straight through the tender neck; yet the Pelian spear did not sever the windpipe, so that Hector could still answer him with words.
He fell into the dust; and noble Achilles exulted over him: “Hector, when you stripped Patroclus, you thought he would be safe, and you showed no fear of me, since I was far away.
But I, his avenger, much greater than he, remained behind beside the hollow ships; I have loosened your knees.
You the dogs and birds shall drag away shamefully, but the Achaeans shall give Patroclus burial.”
Hector, fainting, the flashing-helmeted warrior answered
him:
“I beg you by your life, by your knees, by your parents, do not let the dogs devour me beside the ships of the Achaeans.

Accept the bronze and gold in abundance—gifts your father and honored mother will give you—and give my body back home, that the Trojans and the wives of the Trojans may grant me fire when I am dead.”
Swift-footed Achilles looked darkly at him:
“Do not beg me, dog, by my knees or by my parents!
Would that my spirit and my heart could drive me to cut away your flesh and eat it raw, for what you have done!
There is no one who could keep the dogs from your head, not even if they brought here ten times and twenty times the ransom, and promised yet more, nor even if Priam, son of Dardanus, should command them to weigh you out in gold.
Not even then would your honored mother lay you upon the bed and mourn the son she bore; dogs and birds shall divide you whole.” Hector, dying, answered him: “I knew you well, and therefore I look to you without hope; I was never going to persuade you, for your heart is iron.
Take care, lest I become the anger of the gods against you, on that day when Paris and Phoebus Apollo shall destroy you, brave as you are, beside the Scaean gates.”
So he spoke; and the end of death covered him.

His spirit flew from his limbs and went down to Hades, weeping its fate, leaving its manhood and youth.

Even dead, noble Achilles addressed
him:

“Die. My own death I shall accept at whatever time

Zeus and the other immortal gods may wish to bring it.”

So he spoke, and drew the bronze spear from the dead man, and laid it far away; then he stripped the bloody armor from Hector’s shoulders. The other sons of the Achaeans came running around him; they gazed upon the stature and the wonderful beauty of Hector.

Yet no man stood near him without striking; and one would say, looking at his neighbor:

“Ah me, Hector is far softer to touch
now

than when he set the ships ablaze with destructive fire!”

So each would speak, and, standing near, strike him.

When swift-footed, noble Achilles had stripped the armor, he stood among the Achaeans and spoke these winged words:

“Friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives,

since the gods have granted us to master this man, who wrought as many evils as all the others together, come, let us test the city around him in his armor,

that we may still learn what the Trojans intend:

will they abandon the high city when this man has fallen, or are they resolved to remain, though Hector is no more?

“But why has my dear spirit reasoned
thus?

There lies beside the ships Patroclus, unwept and unburied;

I will not forget him while I live and my knees still move.

And if the dead forget in Hades’
house,

even there I shall remember my beloved companion.

Come now, young men of the Achaeans, singing the paean, let us go back to the hollow ships, and take this man with us.

We have won great glory: we have slain noble Hector, whom the Trojans prayed to through their city as to a god.”

So he spoke; and he devised shameful things against noble Hector.

Behind both feet he pierced the tendons above the ankles, from heel to heel, and fastened ox-hide thongs there; he tied them to the chariot, but left the head to be dragged.

Then he mounted the chariot, lifted the famous armor, and lashed the horses to drive. They flew forward willingly.

A great cloud of dust rose around the one being dragged;

his dark hair spread out on either
side,

and his whole head—once so gracious—lay in the dust.
Then Zeus gave him to his enemies to dishonor in his own fatherland.
His mother saw him and tore her hair from her head;
she cast her shining veil far from her, and cried aloud when she looked upon her son.
His dear father groaned, and the people throughout the city were seized by wailing and lamentation.
It seemed most like this: as if all steep-browed Ilium were smoldering in fire from its highest roof.
The people could scarcely restrain the old man, who longed to leave through the Dardanian gates.
He rolled himself in the dung and pleaded with all of them, calling each man aloud by name: “Hold me back, my friends, and leave me alone, though you grieve for me. Let me go out from the city and reach the ships of the Achaeans.
I shall beg that reckless, mighty worker of evil—perhaps he may respect my age and pity my old age.
For he too has such a father, Peleus, who begot him and raised him to be the ruin of the Trojans.
Most of all he has brought grief upon
me.

So many flourishing sons he has
killed!
Yet I do not lament all of them so greatly,
though I grieve, as I lament one alone—
Hector, whose sharp grief will carry me down into Hades.
Would that he had died in my hands!
Then his mother, who bore him, and I ourselves would have had enough of weeping and mourning over him.” So he spoke, weeping, and the citizens groaned around him.
Among the Trojan women Hecuba began the close lament: “My child, unhappy as I am! Why shall I live on, after suffering such things, with you
dead?
You were my pride through night and day in the city, and a blessing to all the Trojans and Trojan women throughout it; they welcomed you like a god, for while you lived you were a great glory to them. But now death and fate overtake you.” So she spoke, weeping; but Hector’s wife had not yet heard.
No truthful messenger had come to tell her that her husband remained outside the gates.
She was weaving within the high chamber of her house a double purple mantle, and sewing many colored flowers into it.

She had called her fair-haired maidens through the halls to set a great tripod upon the fire, so that warm baths might be ready for Hector when he returned from battle—poor woman, not knowing that far from the baths gray-eyed Athena had overcome him beneath Achilles' hands.
Then she heard the cry and wailing from the tower.
Her limbs spun around, and the shuttle fell to the ground.
Again she spoke to her well-haired maidens:
"Come, two of you, follow me, that I may see what has happened.
I heard the voice of my honored mother-in-law;
my heart leaps within my breast to my mouth, and beneath me my knees are frozen.
Some evil is near the children of Priam.
Would that the word had fallen far from my ears!
But I greatly fear that noble Achilles has cut down my bold Hector alone, has driven him from the city onto the plain, and ended that grievous pride which held him, since he never remained among the crowd of men, but ran far ahead, yielding his strength to no one."
So speaking, she rushed from the chamber like a woman possessed, her heart beating hard; and the maidens went with her.

When she reached the tower and the gathering of men, she stood upon the wall and looked
around.
There she saw him dragged before
the city;
the swift horses drew him without pity toward the hollow ships of the Achaeans. Darkness covered her eyes;
she fell backward, and her spirit breathed out.
Far from her head she cast the shining ornaments:
the headband, the hair-net, the woven circlet, and the veil that golden Aphrodite gave her on the day when Hector, the flashing-helmeted warrior, led her from the house of Eetion, after bringing countless gifts.
Around her stood her sisters-in-law and the wives of her brothers; they held her, as one terrified of dying.
When she had drawn breath again and her heart gathered itself, she began the lament among the Trojan women:
"Hector, I am wretched! We were born under one fate, you in Troy, in Priam's house, and I in Thebes beneath wooded Placos, in the house of Eetion, who raised me while I was still a child—unhappy, born to an unhappy lot.
Would that he had never begotten

me!

“Now you go to the hidden houses of Hades beneath the earth, and leave me a widow in the halls, in hateful grief.

Our child is still a little one, whom you and I, unhappy parents, brought forth.

Neither will you be a help to him,

Hector, since you are dead, nor will he be a help to you.

For even if he escapes the tearful war
of the Achaeans,

there will always be toil and sorrow for him afterward;

others will divide the fields that were his father’s.

“The day of orphanhood makes a child without companions.

He hangs his head, and tears wet both his cheeks;

in need, the boy goes to his father’s
companions,

pulling one by the cloak and another by the tunic.

One of them, moved to pity, gives him a little cup;

he wets his lips, but does not moisten his palate.

Then the well-fed child, whose parents both live, drives him from the feast with blows and harsh words:

‘Go away! Your father does not share a meal with us.’

“The tearful child returns to his widowed mother,

Astyanax, who once upon his father’s knees

ate only the marrow and rich fat of sheep.

When sleep took him and he ceased his childish crying, he would sleep in the soft bed, in the arms of his nurse, flourishing there and filled with joy.

But now, having lost his beloved
father,

he will suffer many things—Astyanax,

as the Trojans call him by name—for you alone

guarded their gates and their long walls.

“Now the writhing worms beside the curved ships,

far from his parents, will eat you when the dogs are sated, and you will lie naked; while here in the halls

your garments lie, fine and beautiful, made by women’s hands.

But I will burn them all in blazing
fire;

they bring no benefit to you, since you will not lie in them.

Yet they shall be glory for the Trojan men and women.”

So she spoke weeping, and the women groaned beside her.

Source range: Book 22. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 23

First-pass working translation

So the Trojans groaned throughout the city; but the Achaeans, when they had reached their ships and the Hellespont, scattered each man to his own vessel.
Achilles would not let the Myrmidons scatter, but spoke among his horse-loving
companions:
“Myrmidons, my eager companions, do not yet unyoke the single-hoofed horses from beneath the chariots.
Let us draw near with horses and chariots themselves, and mourn Patroclus; for that is the honor of the dead.
But when we have satisfied ourselves with bitter lament, we shall unyoke the horses and take our meal here.”
So he spoke; and all together they groaned, while Achilles led them.
Three times they drove the fair-maned horses around the dead
man, mourning him; and Thetis stirred within them the desire to weep.
The sands were wet with tears, and the armor of the men was wet with tears as well; such was their longing for the leader of flight.
Then the son of Peleus began the close lament, laying his man-slaying hands upon the breast of his companion:

“Farewell, Patroclus, even in the house of Hades.

I am fulfilling for you all that I promised before:

I have dragged Hector here, and will give him raw to the dogs; and before your pyre I will cut the throats of twelve glorious children of the Trojans, in anger because you are dead.”

So he spoke; and he devised shameful
things against noble Hector, stretching him face-down in the dust beside the bed of Menoetius’ son.

The others stripped off their shining bronze armor, unharnessed the loud-neighing

horses,

and sat down by the swift son of Aeacus’ ship,

many thousands of them. Achilles gave them a noble funeral feast.

Many white cattle bellowed as they were slaughtered around the steel; many sheep and bleating goats were
killed;

many white-tusked boars, rich with fat,

were stretched out and singed across the fire of Hephaestus.

All around the dead man the blood ran in streams from the cups.

Meanwhile the Achaean kings led swift-footed Achilles

to great Agamemnon, persuading him with difficulty, for anger at his companion was heavy upon his heart.

When they reached Agamemnon’s shelter,

they immediately ordered the clear-voiced heralds to set a great tripod upon the fire, hoping to persuade the son of Peleus to wash away the blood and dust.
But he firmly refused, and swore an oath:
“No, by Zeus, the highest and greatest of the gods, it is not right that a bath should come near my head before I have laid Patroclus upon the
fire, raised a mound over him, and cut my hair.
For no second grief like this shall ever come to my heart while I remain among the living.
“But let us now submit to the hateful meal;
and at dawn, lord Agamemnon, marshal of men, stir the army to bring wood, and have ready all that is fitting for the dead man to go beneath the dark mist, so that tireless fire may burn him quickly from our eyes and the people turn again to their work.”
So he spoke; and they listened closely and obeyed.
They hastily prepared the meal, each man at his station, and ate; nor did any heart lack its equal share.
When they had satisfied their desire for drink and food,

the others went away, each man to his shelter and his bed.
But Achilles lay upon the shore of the loud-roaring sea, among the many Myrmidons, in an open place where the waves washed over the beach.
When sweet sleep seized him and loosened the cares of his heart—for his shining limbs had grown very weary from pursuing Hector toward windy Ilium—
then the soul of unhappy Patroclus came to him, like him in stature, eyes, voice, and clothing upon his skin.
It stood above his head and spoke these words:
“You sleep, Achilles, and have forgotten me.
You did not neglect me while I lived, but now that I am dead.
Bury me as quickly as you can, that I may pass through the gates of Hades. The souls, the images of the weary dead, hold me far away; they do not yet permit me to mingle with them beyond the River, but I wander aimlessly around the broad-gated house of Hades.
“Give me your hand; I mourn, for I shall not return again from Hades once you have granted me my portion of fire.
We shall never again, alive and apart from our dear companions, sit together and plan our counsels; hateful fate has swallowed me, the fate that was mine when I was born.

And for you yourself, godlike Achilles, there is a fate: to perish beneath the wall of the prosperous Trojans.
“I will tell you one more thing, and charge it upon you, if you will obey me: do not lay my bones apart from yours, Achilles, but together, as we were raised together in your house, from the time when Menoetius brought me from Opus, still a little child, to your home, after I had killed Amphidamas’ son unwillingly,
in anger over a game of knucklebones.
Then horseman Peleus received me into his house, raised me tenderly, and named me your companion.
So let one golden urn, the great two-handled vessel that your honored mother gave you, cover our bones together.”
Swift-footed Achilles answered him: “Why have you come here, dear brother, and charged me with each of these things?
I shall fulfill them all, and obey as you command.
But come nearer; let us at least for a little while embrace one another and take our fill of bitter mourning.”

So speaking, he reached out with his dear hands, but did not take him. The soul, like smoke, went beneath the earth with a shrill sound; and Achilles sprang up in amazement, clapped his hands together, and spoke this mournful word: “Ah me! There is indeed something in the house of Hades—a soul and an image—but there is no mind in it at all.
For all night the soul of unhappy Patroclus
stood beside me, weeping and lamenting, and charged me with every matter; it was wonderfully like him.” So he spoke; and he stirred in them all the desire for lament.
While they mourned, rosy-fingered Dawn appeared around the pitiable dead.
Then lord Agamemnon urged the mules and men to bring wood from every shelter; and brave Meriones, companion of noble Idomeneus, rose among them.
They went out with axes in their hands and well-woven ropes, and the mules went before them.
They climbed and descended, crossed slopes and level ground, and turned along the paths.
But when they came to the folds of many-fountained Ida, they quickly cut the high-tressed oaks with sharp bronze.

The trees fell with a great crash; the Achaean split them, and tied them behind the mules; the mules tore up the earth with their feet as they hurried through the thick brush, eager to reach the plain. All the woodcutters carried logs, as Meriones, companion of noble Idomeneus, had commanded.
They threw the timber down in rows upon the shore, where Achilles had marked the great monument for Patroclus and for himself. When they had cast down the measureless wood on every side, they sat and waited, gathered together.
Then swift-footed Achilles commanded the war-loving Myrmidons
to put on their bronze and yoke each man his horses beneath the cars.
They sprang up, clothed themselves in armor, and mounted the chariots, drivers and companions alike; the horsemen went in front, and behind them followed a cloud of footmen, many thousands.
In the midst the companions carried Patroclus.
They covered the whole dead man with the hair they had cut; and behind him noble Achilles held the head in his hands, grieving, for he was sending his blameless companion to Hades.
When they reached the place Achilles had shown them, they laid him down and hastily heaped up the fitting timber.

Then noble, swift-footed Achilles conceived another thought.
He stood apart from the pyre and cut off his yellow hair, which he had let grow thick for the River Spercheius.
Angered, he looked across the wine-dark sea and spoke: “Spercheius, my father Peleus prayed to you in vain when he vowed that, if I should return to my beloved fatherland, I would cut my hair for you and perform a holy hecatomb, and sacrifice there beside your springs fifty unhorned sheep, where your precinct and fragrant altar stand.
So the old man prayed; but you did not fulfill his thought.
Now, since I shall not return to my beloved fatherland, let my hair be carried as a gift to the hero Patroclus.”
So he spoke, and placed the lock in the hands of his dear companion; and he stirred in them all the desire for lament.
The light of the sun would have gone down upon their mourning, if Achilles had not stood near Agamemnon and spoken: “Son of Atreus, the Achaean army will listen to your words more than to any other. There is a time to satisfy grief; now scatter the people from the pyre and order the evening meal.

But let those remain here who care most for the dead, and let them stay beside us.” When Agamemnon, lord of men,
heard him,
he immediately scattered the people among their equal ships.
The mourners remained there and heaped the wood; they made the pyre a hundred feet in length on every side, and set the dead man upon the highest part,
their hearts full of grief.
Before the pyre they flayed and tended many strong sheep and horned, crooked-hoofed cattle.
From all these great-hearted Achilles took the fat and covered the dead man from head to foot; near the bier he leaned two-handled jars of honey and oil. Four-necked horses he cast swiftly upon the pyre, groaning loudly. Nine table-dogs belonged to the lord, and Achilles cut the throats of two and cast them upon the fire. Twelve noble sons of the Trojans he killed with bronze and threw upon the pyre—his heart devising evil things—then set within it the iron strength of the fire, that it might spread.
Afterward he groaned and called his dear companion:
“Farewell, Patroclus, even in the house of Hades.

I have fulfilled all that I promised
before:
twelve noble sons of the great-hearted Trojans the fire is devouring together with
you.
But Hector, son of Priam, I will not give to the fire;
I will give him to the dogs.” So he threatened; but the dogs did not tear at him.
For Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus, kept them away,
day and night, and anointed him with rose-scented, ambrosial oil, so that Achilles would not strip his skin as he dragged him along.
And Phoebus Apollo brought a dark cloud from heaven down over the plain, and covered all
the ground
where the dead man lay, so that the strength of the sun would not dry his skin and sinews all around him.
The pyre of Patroclus still would not burn.
Then noble, swift-footed Achilles
conceived another thought.
He stood apart from the pyre and prayed to the two winds, Boreas and Zephyrus, promising beautiful offerings; many libations he poured from a golden cup and entreated them to come, so that the dead might be burned swiftly by the blazing fire and the timber be driven into flame.
Swiftly Iris,

hearing his prayers, came as messenger to the winds.
They were feasting together in the house of stormy Zephyrus.
Iris, running, stood upon the threshold of stone; when they saw her with their eyes, they all sprang up and each called her to himself. But she refused to sit, and spoke these words: “There is no time to sit. I must go again to the streams of Oceanus, to the land of the Ethiopians, where they offer hecatombs to the immortals, that I too may share in the holy feast.
But Achilles prays that Boreas and loud-sounding Zephyrus will come, and promises beautiful offerings, that you may stir the pyre where Patroclus lies, whom all the Achaeans mourn.” So she spoke and departed; and the winds rose with wondrous roaring, driving the clouds before them.
Swiftly they reached the sea, and a wave rose under their shrill breath. They came to fertile Troy, fell upon the pyre, and the divine fire cried out loudly.
All night they blew upon the flame
together,
breathing sharply; and swift Achilles through the night, taking wine from a golden, two-handled mixing-bowl, poured it upon the ground and wet

the earth,
calling upon the soul of unhappy Patroclus.
As a father mourns the bones of a son, a bridegroom newly dead, whose death has brought grief to his unhappy parents, so Achilles mourned the bones of his
companion,
creeping around the pyre and groaning deeply.
When the star that brings the light goes forth to announce the dawn, and rosy Dawn spreads above the sea, then the pyre’s flame faded and the fire ceased.
The winds turned back again to their home across the Thracian sea, and the sea groaned, swelling beneath them.
Achilles, turning away from the pyre, lay down exhausted, and sweet sleep rushed upon him.
But the others gathered around the son of Atreus;
the murmur and uproar of their approach awoke him.
He sat upright and spoke to them: “Son of Atreus, and all you other leaders of the Achaeans, first quench the whole fire wherever the strength of the flame remains, with bright wine; and afterward let us gather the bones of Patroclus, Menoetius’ son, carefully distinguishing them, for they are easy to recognize. He lay in the middle of the pyre, while the others burned at the edge, horses and men together.

Let us place them in a golden vessel and a double fold of fat, until the time when I too shall lie hidden in Hades.

“I do not command you to labor over a great mound, but only one that is fitting. Later, when I am gone, you Achaeans who remain behind beside the many-oared ships shall raise it broad and high.” So he spoke; and they obeyed swift-footed Achilles.

First they quenched the fire with bright wine, wherever the flame had reached; and the deep ash fell.

Weeping, they gathered the companion’s white bones into a golden vessel and a double fold of fat.

They placed them within the shelter and covered them with fine, soft linen. Then they marked the place of the grave, laid its foundations around the pyre, and immediately poured the heaped earth over it; afterward they went away.

But Achilles held the people there and seated them in a wide assembly. From the ships he brought forth the prizes: cauldrons, tripods, horses, mules, the strong heads of oxen, women with beautiful girdles, and gray iron.

For the horsemen he first set forth splendid prizes:

a woman skilled in fine works, and a two-handled tripod

holding twenty-two measures, for the first man;

for the second, a six-year-old mare, unbroken,

pregnant with a mule foal; for the third, an untouched cauldron,
beautiful,

white still, holding four measures; for the fourth, two talents of gold; and for the fifth, a two-handled cup, untouched by fire.

Then he stood upright and spoke
among the Argives:

“Son of Atreus, and all you
well-greaved Achaeans—”

“The prizes for the horsemen lie here in the assembly, ready to be won.

If the Achaeans were now competing in some other contest,

I myself should take the first and carry it to my shelter.

You know how far my horses surpass the others in excellence:

they are immortal, and Poseidon gave them to my father Peleus, who in turn gave them to me. But I shall remain here, and my single-hoofed horses with me, for they have lost their gentle charioteer, whose fame was great—

the man who often poured soft oil over them

after washing them in clear water.

They stand there grieving him, their manes fallen upon the ground, and the two remain motionless, their hearts heavy with sorrow.

But let the others who trust their horses and well-joined chariots make ready throughout the army.”

So spoke the son of Peleus; and the swift horsemen gathered.

First rose lord Eumelus, beloved son of Admetus, who was distinguished beyond all men in horsemanship.

After him rose the strong son of Tydeus, Diomedes, and brought beneath the yoke the Trojan horses which he had taken from Aeneas, though Apollo saved Aeneas himself.

After him rose golden-haired

Menelaus, son of Atreus, of Zeus’s line, and brought beneath the yoke his swift horses:

Aethē, Agamemnon’s mare, and his own Podargus.

Aethē was given to Agamemnon by Echeolus, son of Anchises, as a gift, so that he would not have to follow the army to windy Ilium, but might remain at home in pleasure;

Zeus had granted him great wealth, and he dwelt in broad Sicyon.

Menelaus brought her beneath the yoke, though she strained to hold back the rush of the race.

Antilochus, fourth, harnessed his thick-maned horses, the shining son of Nestor, great-hearted ruler, son of Neleus. His horses, born in Pylos, carried his swift chariot. His father stood near him and spoke with good counsel to his thoughtful son:

“Antilochus, though you are young, Zeus and Poseidon have loved you, and taught you every kind of horsemanship; there is little need for me to teach you, since you know well how to turn around the turning-post.

But your horses are slowest to run, and I fear this will bring you ruin.

The horses of the others are swifter, but the men themselves know no more cleverness than you.

Come, put every kind of cunning into your heart, so that the prize may not escape you.

“The woodcutter is not so much aided by strength as by skill, nor does the helmsman with skill alone guide his swift ship through the wine-dark sea when the winds beat upon it; so skill lets charioteer surpass charioteer.

The man who trusts his horses and chariot, and turns carelessly far out along the course, lets the horses wander and does not hold them back.

But the man who knows how to drive even weaker horses keeps his eyes forever upon the turning-post, turns close beside it, and does not forget how at the beginning to stretch the hide reins.

“I shall tell you a sign that will be plain,
and you will not fail to see it. A dry stump stands there, about a fathom above the ground, of oak or pine;
rain has not rotted it. Two white stones stand against it on either side, where the roads meet, and the race-course is smooth around it. It may be the monument of a man long dead, or it may once have been a turning-post set there by men of former days; now swift Achilles
has made it the turning-point.
“Drive as close to it as you can, with chariot and horses; lean yourself in the well-woven car toward the left, but spur the right-hand horse, crying
aloud,
and give him the reins to yield in your hands.
Let the left-hand horse draw close to the turning-post, so that the wheel’s rim may seem almost to graze its edge.
But beware the stone, lest you wound your horses
and break the chariot; that would delight the others and bring shame upon you.
Therefore be prudent and watchful.
“For if, driving in pursuit, you pass the turning-post,

there is no one who could catch you by rushing forward, nor pass you—not even if behind you he drove noble Arion, Adrastus’s swift horse, born from a
god, or the horses of Laomedon, the excellent ones that were raised here.” So spoke Nestor, son of Neleus, and sat back in his place, having told his son every limit of the course.
Meriones, fifth, harnessed his thick-maned horses.
They mounted the chariots and cast lots; Achilles shook them, and the lot sprang out for Nestor’s son, Antilochus. Next the lot fell to lord Eumelus; after him, Menelaus, famous with the
spear;
then Meriones received the turn to drive;
and last, though by far the best, Diomedes received the lot.
They stood in line, and Achilles marked the turning-post far off in the smooth plain. Beside it he set Phoenix, his father’s godlike companion, to watch the race and report the truth of what was done.
All together they lifted their whips above the horses, struck them with the reins, and urged them with their voices.

Swiftly they flew across the plain, far from the ships;
the dust rose beneath their breasts like a cloud or storm, and their manes streamed backward in the breathing wind.
Now the chariots touched the earth, now sprang upward;
the drivers stood within their cars, and each man's heart beat hard with desire for victory.
Each called to his horses, and they flew through the dust across
the plain.
But when the swift horses completed the last stretch and turned again beside the gray sea, then each man's skill appeared, and the horses stretched their speed.
Swiftly the horses of the son of Pheres, Eumelus, came racing ahead; after them came the stallions of Diomedes, the Trojan horses, and they were not far away, but very near. They seemed always about to leap upon the back of Eumelus's chariot; their breath warmed his broad back and shoulders, for they held their heads above him as they flew.
The son of Tydeus would have passed him or made the race even, if Phoebus Apollo had not grown angry with him and knocked the shining whip from his hands.
Tears poured from his eyes in anger, because he saw the other horses running yet more swiftly, while his own were checked without the goad.

But Apollo did not escape the notice of Athena;
she quickly came after the shepherd
of the people, gave the whip back to him, and put strength into his horses.
She went in anger after the son of Admetus, and broke his horse's yoke. The horses ran apart from the course, and the pole fell loose upon the ground.
Eumelus himself rolled out beside the wheel;
his elbows, mouth, and nostrils were torn,
his brow was battered above the eyes, his eyes filled with tears, and his strong voice was stopped.
Diomedes turned his single-hoofed horses aside, and sprang far ahead of the others; for Athena had put strength into his horses and set glory upon him.
After him came golden-haired Menelaus, son of Atreus.
Antilochus called to his father's
horses:
"Come on, both of you; stretch yourselves as swiftly as you can.
I do not command you to race those horses of Diomedes, the son of Tydeus, to whom Athena has now given speed and placed the glory upon him. But reach the horses of the son of Atreus; do not let the mare Aethē, though she is female, pour shame upon you by falling behind.

Why do you lag, when you are the better horses?
“For I tell you this, and it shall surely be fulfilled:
there will be no more care of you beside Nestor, shepherd of the people;
he will kill you with sharp bronze, if through our carelessness we carry home a lesser prize.
Therefore follow and hasten.
I myself will devise and think how to pass them at the narrow place, and the chance shall not escape me.” So he spoke; and the horses, afraid of their master’s cry, ran harder for a little while. Soon strong-hearted Antilochus saw the narrow place in the road.
There was a hollow where winter rain had broken through the earth and torn away the road, deepening the whole ground.
Menelaus was guiding there, avoiding the wheel-tracks.
But Antilochus turned his single-hoofed horses outside the road,
and drove after him, swerving only a little.
Then the son of Atreus grew afraid and cried to Antilochus:

“Antilochus, you drive without wisdom; hold back your horses!
The road is narrow, but soon it will be wider, and you may pass.
Take care lest, striking both chariots, you harm us—”
But Antilochus drove on, pressing them with the goad, as though they could not hear him.
The distance between them was no greater than the reach of a discus when a young man, testing his strength, hurls it from his shoulder.
So far the horses ran ahead; but Menelaus himself had willingly let them go, lest the single-hoofed horses should meet upon the road and overturn the well-woven cars, and the drivers fall in their eager struggle for victory.
Then, rebuking him, golden-haired Menelaus spoke: “Antilochus, no other mortal is more destructive than you.
Go, since the Achaeans have never called you wise.
Yet even so you shall not carry off the prize without an oath.”
So he spoke, and called to his horses: “Do not hold back or stand there grieving.
The feet and knees of those horses will tire before yours; both teams are deprived of youth.” So he spoke; and, fearing their lord’s cry,
the horses ran harder, and soon drew
near.

The Argives, seated in the assembly, watched the horses flying over the plain and raising dust.
First Idomeneus, leader of the Cretans, recognized them; he sat outside the assembly on a high lookout.
Although he was far away, he heard the caller's voice, and recognized the conspicuous horse running in front—the horse that was chestnut everywhere else, but bore a round white mark upon its brow, like the full moon.
He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives:
“Friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives,
do I alone see these horses, or do you also see them?
Other horses seem to me to be ahead, and another driver appears to be leading them.
The horses that led at first have surely been harmed somewhere upon the plain; I saw them first turning beside the post, but now I cannot see them.
My eyes search everywhere across the Trojan plain.
Perhaps the driver let the reins slip
from his hands, and could not hold them well around
the turning-post;
I think he fell out there and broke his chariot.

The mares run on, after gathering their strength.
Rise and look for yourselves; I cannot see clearly.
The man seems to me to be Aetolian by birth, the strong son of Tydeus, Diomedes, who rules among the Argives.” Swift Ajax, son of Oileus, rebuked
him: “Idomeneus, why are you so loud in your talk?
The horses are still far away, leaping over the broad plain.
You are not so young among the Argives,
nor do the eyes in your head look so sharply.
Yet you are always boastful in speech;
it is not fitting for you to be a loud-talker, since there are better men here.
Those are the same mares as before, Eumelus's own, and he himself holds the reins and drives among them.” The Cretan leader answered him angrily:
“Ajax, best at quarrel, witless in all things, you fall short of the Argives in everything because your mind is harsh. Come, let us wager a tripod or a cauldron, and make Agamemnon
judge between us, so that you may learn by paying which horses are first.”

So he spoke; and swift Ajax, son of Oileus, rose at once, angry and eager to answer him with harsh words.
The quarrel would have grown still further between them if Achilles himself had not risen and spoken: “Do not answer one another now with bitter words, Ajax and Idomeneus; it is not seemly.
It would be shameful if anyone else behaved so.
Stay seated in the assembly and watch the horses;
they will soon arrive here themselves, running for victory.
Then each of you will know which horses of the Argives are second, and which were ahead
before.”
So he spoke. Then Diomedes, son of Tydeus, came near, driving hard and ever lashing downward with the whip.
His horses leapt high and quickly ran their course.
Drops of dust struck the charioteer again and again;
the chariot, thickly plated with gold and tin, ran after the swift-footed horses, and no broad trail of wheel marks rose behind them in the fine dust.
They came to the center of the assembly;
the horses poured heavy sweat from mane and breast.

The strong Sthenelus leapt down from the shining chariot, leaned the whip against the yoke, and did not miss his prize.
He gave the woman and the two-handled tripod
to his proud companions to carry; but he himself unyoked the horses.
After him Antilochus drove the horses of Neleus's son, passing Menelaus by cunning, not by speed.
Yet Menelaus kept his swift horses very near him.
As far as the horse of a chariot stands from its wheel, when it draws its lord across the plain with the car, so that the tips of its tail hairs brush
the wheel,
and it runs close, with little space between it and the wheel racing over the wide plain—so far Menelaus was behind noble Antilochus.
At first he had been left farther back, almost as far as a discus can be thrown, but quickly he reached him again; for the fine-maned Aethē, Agamemnon's mare, gave him fresh strength. If the road had been longer for both of them, he would have passed him, and the race would not have been in doubt.
Meriones, good companion of Idomeneus,

was behind glorious Menelaus by the length of a spear-cast.

His fine-maned horses were slowest, and he himself was least skilled at driving in the assembly.

The son of Admetus came last of all, dragging his beautiful chariot and driving his horses before him.

Swift-footed noble Achilles saw him and pitied him.

He stood among the Argives and spoke these words:

“The best man comes last, driving his single-hoofed horses.

Come, let us give him a prize that is fitting for second place; but let the son of Tydeus carry off the first.”

So he spoke; and all approved his command.

They would have given Eumelus the mare, for the Achaeans approved the thought, if Antilochus, great-hearted son of Nestor, had not risen and answered Achilles in justice:

“Achilles, I shall be very angry with you if you fulfill this word.

You intend to take away my prize because his chariot and swift horses were harmed, though he himself is an excellent man.

He should have prayed to the immortal gods; then he would not have come last in pursuit.

But if you pity him and he is dear to your heart, there is much gold in your shelter, bronze, sheep, serving women, and single-hoofed horses.

Take from these and give him a greater prize, even now, so that the Achaeans may praise you.

But I will not give up this mare; let any man among us who wishes to fight me with his hands contend for her.”

Swift-footed Achilles smiled, glad for Antilochus, because he was a dear companion, and answered him:

“Antilochus, if you command me to give Eumelus something else from my own shelter, I shall do that as well.

I will give him the bronze breastplate I stripped from Asteropaeus, the armor around which a bright casing of tin is coiled; it will be worth much to him.”

So he spoke, and commanded his dear companion Automedon to bring it from the shelter.

Automedon went and brought it; Achilles placed it in the hands of Eumelus, who received it gladly.

Then Menelaus rose, grieving in his heart, and was fiercely angry with Antilochus.

The herald placed the staff in his hand and ordered the Argives to be silent.

Menelaus, a man like the gods, spoke:

“Antilochus, what have you done?
You were thought wise before, but you have shamed my skill and harmed my horses, driving your own horses before mine, though they were far worse.
Come, leaders and rulers of the Argives, judge fairly between us; do not favor either side, lest one of the bronze-clad Achaeans say: ‘Menelaus used lies and force against Antilochus,
and went away with the mare, though his horses were much worse, while he himself was superior in skill and strength.’
If you wish, I myself will judge, and I say no other Danaan will rebuke me; my judgment shall be straight.
“Antilochus, son of Zeus, come here, as justice requires.
Stand before your horses and
chariot,
holding in your hands the slender whip with which you drove before; lay your hand upon the horses and swear by Earth-shaking Poseidon that you did not deliberately block my chariot by guile.” Then thoughtful Antilochus
answered him: “Hold back now, lord Menelaus; I am far younger than you, and you are older and better. You know what excesses belong to a young man: his mind is quick, and his judgment is light. Therefore let your heart endure.

I will give you the mare I won for myself.
Even if you should ask some greater thing from my shelter, I would give it to you at once, rather than fall forever from your heart, son of Zeus, and become guilty before the gods.” So he spoke, and led the mare and placed her in Menelaus’s hands.
Menelaus’s heart was refreshed, as dew lies upon the ears of grain when the field is ripening and the crops bristle;
so, Menelaus, your heart was refreshed.
He spoke to Antilochus: “Antilochus, now I myself will yield to you in anger, since you were not a reckless or senseless man before; but now youth overcame your judgment.
In the future avoid deceiving better
men.
No other Achaean could have persuaded me so quickly.
But you and your good father and brother have suffered much for my sake; therefore, when you beg me, I will obey.
I will give you the mare, though she is mine, so that these men may know that my heart is never overbearing or pitiless.”
So he spoke, and gave the mare to Noemon,
the companion of Antilochus, to lead
away;

and Eumelus took the shining cauldron.
Eumelus took the shining cauldron; Meriones lifted two talents of gold, fourth in the race.
The fifth prize remained, the two-handled cup.
Achilles carried it through the assembly of the Argives and gave it to Nestor, speaking as he stood beside him: “Here, old man; let this be a treasure kept by you, a memorial of Patroclus’s burial. You will never again see him among the Argives. I give you this prize without a contest, for you will not box, nor wrestle, nor enter the spear-throwing, nor run upon your feet; grievous old age presses you now.” So speaking, he placed it in his hands; and Nestor received it gladly, and answered him: “Yes, my child, you have spoken all these things in due measure.
My limbs are no longer firm, nor my feet, nor do my hands spring lightly from either shoulder.
Would that I were young again, and my strength as it was when the Epeians buried lord Amarynceus in Buprasium, and the sons of the king appointed prizes for him!
Then no man was my equal, neither among the Epeians, nor among the Pylians, nor among the great-hearted Aetolians.

In boxing I defeated Clytomedes, son of Enops; in wrestling I overcame Ancaeus of Pleuron, who rose against me; I outran noble Iphiclus on my feet; and with the spear I surpassed Phyleus and Polydorus.
“Only the two sons of Actor passed me with their horses, throwing themselves ahead by the crowd’s favor, for the greatest prizes had been left
there.
They were twins: one held the reins steadily, while the other urged the horses with the whip.
Such was I once; now let younger men contend in such contests; and I must obey grievous old age, though then I stood forth among the heroes.
Go now, and honor your companion with these games.
I receive this gift willingly, and my heart rejoices that you remember me always, and do not forget the honor that it is fitting I should have among the Achaeans.
May the gods give you a fitting reward in return.”
So he spoke; and the son of Peleus went through the great crowd of Achaeans, having heard all the praise of Neleus’s son.

Then he set out other prizes for the grievous boxing match:
a hard-working mule, six years old,
unbroken,
and tied her in the middle of the assembly;
for the defeated man he placed a two-handled cup.
He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives:
“Son of Atreus, and all you
well-greaved Achaeans, we call upon two men to rise and contend for these prizes, lifting their fists and striking one another.
To whichever man Apollo grants enduring strength, and all the Achaeans recognize as victor, let him lead the hard-working mule back to his shelter; but the defeated man shall carry home the cup.”
So he spoke; and at once Epeius rose, handsome and great, the son of Panopaeus, skilled in boxing. He grasped the hard-working mule
and spoke aloud: “Let whoever will come near to carry away the cup.
I say no other Achaean will lead the mule away by defeating me in boxing; I claim to be the best.
Is it not enough that I fall short in
battle?
It was never possible for one man to know every task.

But I tell you this, and it shall surely
be fulfilled:
I will break his flesh and crush his bones face to face.
Let those who care for him remain gathered here; they will carry him away when he is overcome beneath my hands.”
So he spoke; and all became silent.
Only Euryalus rose against him, a man like the gods, son of Mekisteus, son of the lord Talaius, who once came to Thebes at the burial of Oedipus, and there defeated all the Cadmeans.
The famous son of Tydeus stood beside him,
encouraging him with words and desiring greatly that he should win. First he set a belt around his waist, and afterward gave him gloves, well cut from the hide of a wild ox.
When the two had girded themselves, they went into the middle of the assembly, raised their strong
hands,
and rushed together, their heavy fists meeting.
The terrible grinding of their jaws arose;
sweat streamed from every limb.
Then noble Epeius sprang upon him, and struck the watching Euryalus upon the cheek.
He could not stand there long; his shining limbs gave way.

As when a fish leaps upon a seaweed-covered shore under the shuddering blast of Boreas, and the black wave covers it—so Euryalus leapt beneath the blow.
But great-hearted Epeius seized him and raised him; his dear companions stood around
him,
and led him through the assembly, his feet dragging, spitting thick blood and letting his head fall to one side.
They seated him among them, dazed; then they themselves went and carried away the two-handled cup.
The son of Peleus immediately set out other prizes, the third, to display the painful art of wrestling:
for the victor, a great tripod for setting upon the fire, valued by the Achaeans at twelve
oxen;
for the defeated man he brought into the middle a woman, skilled in many works, and valued at four oxen.
He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives: “Rise, you who will also make trial of this prize.”
So he spoke; and great Telamonian Ajax rose,
and resourceful Odysseus rose, knowing every advantage.
They girded themselves and went into the middle of the assembly, then seized one another around the waist with strong hands, as when the beams of a high house are joined by a famous builder to guard it against the violence of the winds.

Their backs creaked, pulled tightly by their powerful hands; sweat streamed down them, and many red welts rose along their ribs and shoulders, as they both forever desired victory for the wrought tripod.
Neither Odysseus could throw the other upon the ground, nor Ajax; for the strong force of Odysseus held firm.
But when they had begun to weary the well-greaved Achaeans, great Telamonian Ajax spoke to him: “Divine son of Laertes, resourceful Odysseus,
either lift me, or I will lift you; and let Zeus care for the rest.” So he spoke, and lifted him; but Odysseus did not forget his cunning.
He struck him from behind upon the hollow of the knee, loosed his legs, and threw him backward.
Odysseus fell upon his breast, and the people looked on, astonished and admiring.
Then long-suffering noble Odysseus lifted Ajax in his turn; he stirred him a little from the ground, but could not raise him.
He bent one knee, and both men fell upon the earth together, close beside one another, and were soiled with dust.

They would have sprung up and wrestled for a third time, if Achilles himself had not risen and held them back: “Do not strain yourselves any longer or wear yourselves down with harm. Victory belongs to you both. Take equal prizes and go, so that the other Achaeans may also compete.”
So he spoke; and they listened closely
and obeyed.
They wiped the dust away and put their tunics on again.
Then the son of Peleus swiftly set out other prizes for speed: a silver mixing-bowl, beautifully wrought, holding six measures.
In beauty it surpassed all vessels throughout the land, for the many-skilled Sidonians had fashioned it well; Phoenician men had brought it across the misty sea, set it in harbors, and given it as a gift to Thoas.
The son of Jason, Euneus, gave it as the price of Lycaon, son of Priam, to Patroclus the hero.
Achilles set it forth as the prize for the swiftest runner.
For the second he set a great ox, rich with fat; and for the last he placed half a talent of gold.
He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives: “Rise, you who will make trial of this prize.”

So he spoke; and swift Ajax, son of Oileus, rose at once; resourceful Odysseus rose after him;
and then Antilochus, son of Nestor, for he surpassed all the young men with his feet.
They stood in line, and Achilles marked the turning-point.
From the line Ajax sprang first; noble Odysseus rose after him, very close, as close as a woman’s loom-measuring rod lies against her breast when she stretches it carefully with her hands, drawing the shuttle from the thread and holding it close to her chest.
So Odysseus ran close behind him, and struck the tracks with his feet before the dust could settle;
as he ran swiftly, his breath fell upon Ajax’s head and shoulders.
All the Achaeans cried aloud for victory,
urging him on as he hastened.
When they were completing the last part of the course, Odysseus prayed within his heart to gray-eyed Athena: “Hear me, goddess; come as a good helper to my feet.”
So he prayed; and Pallas Athena
heard him.
She made his limbs light, his feet and hands above.
But when they were about to spring upon the prize, Ajax slipped as he ran—for Athena harmed him.

He slipped where the dung of the bellowing cattle lay scattered, the cattle swift-footed Achilles had slain for Patroclus.

The dung filled his mouth and his nostrils.

But long-suffering, noble Odysseus seized the mixing-bowl first, while glorious Ajax took the ox.

He stood holding the horn of the wild ox in his hands, spitting out the dung, and spoke among the Argives:

“Ah me, the goddess harmed my feet—she who, like a mother, has always stood beside Odysseus and helped him.”

So he spoke; and all laughed sweetly over him.

Smiling, Antilochus carried off the last prize and spoke:

“I will tell you something you all know: even now the immortals honor older men. Ajax is only a little older than I am, but this other is of an earlier generation, of men who lived before; they call him an old man.

It is hard for an Achaeon to contend with him on foot, unless it is Achilles.”

So he spoke, and praised the swift-footed son of Peleus.

Achilles answered him with winged
words:

“Antilochus, your praise shall not be without reward;

I will add to it half a talent of gold.”

So he spoke, and placed it in his
hands;

and Antilochus received it gladly.

Then the son of Peleus brought into the assembly

the long-shadowed spear, the shield and helmet,

and the armor of Sarpedon, which Patroclus had stripped from him.

He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives:

“We call upon two men, the best, to contend for these things.

Let them put on the armor that cuts the flesh,

take bronze, and try one another before the crowd.

Whichever first reaches the fair flesh of the other,

touches the entrails through the
armor,

and draws dark blood, shall receive this silver-studded sword, the beautiful Thracian weapon I stripped from Asteropaeus.

But let both men carry away this armor as a common prize, and we shall prepare a noble meal for them in our shelters.”

So he spoke; and great Telamonian Ajax rose,

and strong Diomedes, son of Tydeus,
rose.

They armed themselves on opposite sides of the crowd,

then came together into the middle,
eager to fight, with terrible eyes; and all the Achaeans were held in wonder.

When they had come close, they rushed three times against one another, and three times drew back.

Ajax struck the shield, smooth in every direction,

but did not reach the flesh; the corslet held the blow within.

But the son of Tydeus continually reached above the great shield with the point of his shining spear, always toward the neck.

Then the Achaeans, afraid for Ajax, told them to cease,
and to take equal prizes.

The hero gave Diomedes the great
sword,
with its sheath and well-cut baldric.

Then the son of Peleus set a solid mass of iron

in the assembly, the same that mighty Eetion had once used to hurl with all his

strength;

but swift-footed Achilles killed him, and brought the iron aboard the ships with his other possessions.

He stood upright and spoke among
the Argives:

“Rise, you who will also make trial of this prize.

Even if a man’s fields lie far away and are rich,

this will sustain him for five circling
years;

his shepherd and plowman will not lack iron,

but it will supply them.”

So he spoke; and strong Polypoetes
rose,

and the strength of godlike Leonteus
rose,

and Telamonian Ajax, and noble Epeius.

They stood in line; and noble Epeius took the mass, whirled it, and cast it. All the Achaeans laughed.

Leonteus, branch of Ares, threw second.

Great Telamonian Ajax cast third from his strong hand, and sent it beyond all the marks.

But when Polypoetes, steadfast in battle, took the mass, he threw it as far as a shepherd throws his curved staff through the herd of cattle; it flew beyond the whole assembly, and the people shouted.

The companions of strong Polypoetes rose and carried his prize to the hollow ships of their king.

Then the son of Peleus set out iron for the archers:

ten axes, and ten half-axes.

Far off upon the sand he planted the mast of a dark-prowed ship, and tied a trembling dove

by the foot with a slender cord.

He commanded them to shoot at it:

“Whoever strikes the trembling dove shall carry all the axes back to his shelter; but whoever misses the bird and hits only the cord, since he is the weaker archer, shall carry home the half-axes.”

So he spoke; and the strength of Teucer rose first, and good Meriones, companion of Idomeneus, rose after him.
They shook lots in a bronze helmet; Teucer's lot came first.
At once he shot strongly, but did not promise to sacrifice a glorious hecatomb of first-born lambs to the lord of the bow.
He missed the bird—for Apollo begrudged him that—but struck the cord beside its foot; the bitter arrow cut through the cord.
The bird flew upward toward
heaven,
while the cord fell upon the earth; and the Achaeans shouted.
Meriones eagerly drew the bow from
his hand;
he had long held the arrow ready as he aimed.
At once he vowed to far-shooting Apollo
that he would offer a glorious hecatomb of first-born lambs.
High beneath the clouds he saw the trembling dove,
and struck her as she wheeled beneath the wing.
The arrow passed straight through
her;
it fell and fixed itself in the earth before Meriones's feet, while the bird sat upon the mast of the dark-prowed ship, her neck hanging down, her dense wings drooping.

Swiftly her spirit flew from her
limbs,
far from her; and the people looked on in wonder.
Meriones lifted all ten axes, while Teucer carried the ten half-axes to the hollow ships.
Then the son of Peleus brought forth a long-shadowed spear and a cauldron, untouched by fire, worth an ox, and set them in the assembly. The spear-men rose:
wide-ruling Agamemnon, son of Atreus,
and Meriones, good companion of Idomeneus.
Then swift-footed Achilles addressed
them:
“Son of Atreus, we know how far you stand above all men, and how much you surpass them in strength and skill.
Take this prize, the cauldron, and carry it to the hollow ships; but let us give the spear to the hero Meriones,
if you are willing in your heart. So I command.”
So he spoke; and Agamemnon, lord of men, did not refuse.
He gave the bronze spear to Meriones;
and the hero gave the beautiful prize to the herald Talthybius.

Source range: Book 23. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

BOOK 24

First-pass working translation

The games were loosed; the people, each to his swift ship, scattered to take his supper and the gift of sleep.

But Achilles remembered his beloved
companion,
and sleep, the conqueror of all, would not receive him.

He turned from side to side, recalling Patroclus—

his manhood and his strength, and all they had endured, the wars of men, the grievous crossings of the sea.

Remembering these things, he let the living tears fall, now on his side recumbent, now upon his back,

now on his face; then rising upright, paced unresting beside the shore; nor did the dawn escaping over sea and shore elude his eyes. And when he had yoked beneath the car his swift-hoofed horses, he made Hector fast behind the chariot, and three times around the tomb of Menoetius' dead son dragged him; then again

he rested in his hut, and left the body stretched face downward in the dust. But Phoebus kept from Hector all dishonor, pitying him even in

death;

with the golden aegis all around his flesh he covered him, lest Achilles, dragging him, should tear the skin.

Thus in his fury Achilles dishonored noble Hector;

but the blessed gods, beholding, pitied him,

and urged the clear-eyed Slayer of Argus to steal him away.

All this was pleasing to the other gods; but never to Hera, nor Poseidon, nor the gray-eyed Maid, for still they held the sacred city and Priam hateful, and all his people, for the ruin wrought by Alexander, who scorned the goddesses when they came into his court and praised the one who gave him that destructive desire.

But when the twelfth dawn rose, then Phoebus spoke among the immortals: "Cruel gods, and gods of harm! Was Hector never the one to burn for you the thigh-bones of oxen, and goats without defect? Yet now you will not save him, though he is dead, that his wife and mother may behold him, his child, and aged Priam, and the people of Troy,

who would soon burn him in fire and give him burial rites.

No—rather you would serve destructive Achilles, whose heart is not made right, nor has a mind that bends, but knows the savage law, as knows the lion who yields to neither strength nor proud heart when he springs among the flocks of mortal men, to seize his meal.

So Achilles has destroyed all pity; shame, which harms and helps mankind in turn, finds no dwelling in his breast.
Yet some man loses one still dearer—brother, child—and, having wept and mourned, at last lets go; for the relentless Fates have made the mortal heart enduring. But Achilles, after taking Hector's life, still binds him to the tomb of his beloved companion and drags him. This is neither fair nor good for him.
Though he is brave, let us not be angry with him:
he dishonors only the mute earth in his fury.”
White-armed Hera answered, angered: “Silver-bowed, your word might stand, if Hector and Achilles shared one honor. Hector was mortal, and a woman gave him suck; but Achilles is the child of a goddess, whom I myself nursed and adorned, and gave as bride to Peleus, the man beloved among immortals.
You all came to the wedding; and there you feasted, holding your lyre, false friend.”

Then cloud-gathering Zeus answered her: “Do not be wholly enraged against the gods, Hera. Their honor shall not be one; yet Hector was the dearest of the men in Ilium to the gods, as he was dear to me, for never did he fail in gifts.
My altar never lacked its equal feast, libation, or smoke—the honor that we have received. Let us leave the stealing of Hector; it cannot be done unseen from Achilles:
his mother stands beside him, night and day alike.
But let some god call Thetis nearer to me, that I may speak a careful word: Achilles shall receive the gifts from Priam, and release Hector from his hands.” So he spoke, and Iris, swift as a storm-wind, rose to carry the message. Between steep Samos and Imbros she leapt into the dark sea; the water groaned beneath her.
Like lead she plunged into the deep, as a wild bull's horn receives the weight and bears it down among the fish, carrying death to them. She found Thetis in a hollow cave; around her sat the gathered sea-goddesses, and in their midst she mourned the fate of her blameless son, who was to die far from his country, in broad-soiled Troy.

Swift-footed Iris stood beside her and said: "Arise, Thetis.
Zeus calls you—the god whose counsels do not perish." Silver-footed Thetis answered: "Why does that mighty god command me? I am ashamed to mingle with the immortals; my heart is full of grief without measure. Yet I will go; his word shall not be spoken vainly, whatever it may be."
She took the dark veil about her, darker than any garment, and went; before her swift-footed Iris led the way, while the sea's wave curved and parted around them.
They rose from the shore and sped into heaven, and found the wide-seeing Son of Cronus; all the blessed gods, ever enduring, sat assembled there.
Thetis sat beside her father Zeus; Athena yielded her place. White-armed Hera set a beautiful golden cup into her hand, and welcomed her with words of comfort; and Thetis drank from it.
Then the father of gods and men began among them:
"You have come to Olympus, goddess Thetis, grieving still, though I know your sorrow and its unforgotten weight.
Yet I will tell you why I called you here. For nine days now the quarrel has risen among the immortals over Hector's corpse and city-sacker Achilles; they urge the clear-eyed Slayer of Argus to steal the body. But I confer this honor upon Achilles, guarding your reverence and the love you shall retain hereafter.

Go quickly to the army, and charge your son: the gods are angry, and I, beyond all others, am angered, because in his maddened mind he keeps Hector beside the curved ships and will not release him.
Perhaps he may fear me, and release the body. And I shall send Iris to great-hearted Priam, bidding him ransom his dear son, and carry gifts to Achilles—gifts that may soothe his heart." Thetis did not refuse. From Olympus' heights she sprang, and reached the shelter where her son was found, beside the ships, lamenting deeply; all his dear companions were busied with the preparation of their meal, and in the hut a great, thick-fleeced sheep was slain.
The august mother sat beside him, stroked him with her hand, and called him by his name, and spoke: "My child, how long wilt thou consume thy heart in mourning and in pain, forgetful of thy food and of thy bed?
It is a good thing to join in love with a woman; for thy life shall not be long: death and the mighty Fate already stand beside thee.

Hear me at once. I come to thee bearing Zeus' word.
He says the gods are angered with thee, and that he himself, beyond all other immortals, is most deeply angered, because with mind distraught thou keepest Hector by the ships and hast not let him go. Come, then: release the dead, and take the ransom offered for
him." Swift-footed Achilles answered: "So let it be—let him come who brings the ransom and carries away the dead, if the Olympian himself commands it with a willing heart." Thus mother and son beside the ships exchanged their many winged words. Meanwhile the Son of Cronus sent Iris to sacred Ilium: "Go, swift Iris, leave Olympus' seat;
tell great-hearted Priam, within the city, to ransom his dear son, going alone to the ships
of the Achaeans,
and to bring gifts to Achilles—gifts that may soothe his heart.
Let no other Trojan follow him.
Only some older herald may go with him, to guide his mules and his well-wheeled wagon, and afterward bring back to the city the dead man whom noble Achilles killed. Let death not trouble his mind, nor let him fear; we shall give him as guide the Slayer of Argus, who will conduct him safely until he brings him near Achilles.

When he has led him within Achilles' shelter, neither Achilles himself shall kill him, nor shall he let the others kill him; for he is neither foolish, heedless, nor transgressing, but will show great care for the suppliant man."
So he spoke, and storm-swift Iris went bearing the word.
She reached the house of Priam, and found there cries and grief.
His sons sat round their father in the inner court, wet with their tears; the old man in their midst was wrapped in a cloak, close-folded, and much dung lay upon his head and neck, which, rolling on the ground, he had gathered with his own hands. His daughters in the halls, and daughters-in-law, mourned, remembering the many brave men who had fallen, their lives destroyed beneath the Argives' hands.
The messenger of Zeus stood beside Priam and spoke softly; but trembling seized the old king's limbs: "Take courage, Priam, son of Dardanus; let no fear enter thy heart.
I have not come with evil in my sight, but with good intent.
I am a messenger of Zeus, who, though far away, cares for thee and pities thee. The Olympian bids thee ransom noble Hector, and carry gifts to Achilles—gifts that may soothe his heart.

Let no other Trojan follow thee.

Only some older herald

may accompany thee, to guide thy mules and well-wheeled wagon, and afterward bring home the dead man whom noble Achilles killed.

Let death not trouble thy mind, nor fear; for such a guide as the Slayer of Argus shall follow with thee, and lead thee until he brings thee near Achilles.

When he has led thee within the shelter, neither Achilles himself shall kill thee, nor shall he let the others kill thee;

for he is neither foolish, nor heedless, nor a transgressor, but will carefully spare the suppliant man.”

Having spoken thus, swift-footed Iris departed. But Priam commanded his sons to make ready the smooth-running mule-cart, and to fasten its wicker basket upon it. He himself went down into the fragrant chamber, built high of cedar, which held within it many treasures.

There he called his wife Hecuba, and spoke: “Strange one, a messenger from Zeus has come to me, commanding that I go to the ships of the Achaeans, to ransom my beloved son, and bring gifts to Achilles—gifts that may soothe his heart. Tell me, what seems this counsel to thy mind?

For a terrible force and desire urges me to go there, within the wide Achaean host.”

She cried aloud and answered: “Ah me! Where has thy reason fled, for which thou wert renowned among strangers and those thou rulest?

How canst thou wish to go alone among the ships of the Achaeans, into the eyes of the man who has destroyed so many of thy sons, so brave and noble? Thy heart must be made of iron.

If that savage, faithless man should seize thee and behold thee, he would show thee no mercy, nor any reverence. Let us sit here in the hall apart and mourn; for such a thread the mighty Fate spun for thy son when I bore him: that he should feed the swift-footed dogs far from his parents, beside a powerful man.

Then might I bite the liver of that man, clinging to him—such deeds would answer for my child, since he did not kill him while shrinking back, but stood before the Trojans and their wives, remembering neither fear nor flight.”

Then godlike aged Priam answered her: “Do not restrain me when I desire to go; do not become an evil bird of omen within my house. Thou shalt not persuade me. If another man among earth’s people had commanded this—some seer who reads the sacrifices, or a priest—we should call it false, and turn away the more. But now I have heard the god himself, and looked upon him face to face; therefore I shall go, and his word shall not be vain. If it is my portion to die beside the ships of the bronze-clad Achaean, so be it; let Achilles kill me at once, after I have embraced my son and satisfied my heart with mourning.”

So speaking, he opened the beautiful lids of the chests.
From them he drew twelve beautiful robes, twelve cloaks of single fold, and as many rugs, as many shining coverlets, and tunics for them all.
Ten talents of fine gold he weighed and carried forth; two tripods he brought, and four great cauldrons;
and from the chamber came a cup of surpassing beauty, which Thracian men had given him, when he went among them as envoy—a noble treasure. Yet the old king spared it not, for all his heart was set on ransoming his beloved son.
Then he drove all the Trojans from the porch with shameful words: “Away, ye blemished cowards! Is there no mourning in your houses, that ye have come to trouble me? Do ye rejoice that Zeus the Son of Cronus has given me this sorrow, and destroyed my best son?

Ye shall learn it too: the Achaeans will find it easier now to kill you, when he is dead. But I—before I see the city laid waste and ravaged with the sword, may I descend
into the house of Hades!”
With his staff he drove them out; they went before the old man, hastening at his rebuke. He called his sons together, and scolded Helenus, Paris, noble Agathon, Pammon, Antiphonus, the brave-voiced Polites, Deiphobus, Hippothoon, and godlike Agavus: “Make haste, my evil children, hateful as ye are!
Would that ye all had perished in Hector’s place beside the swift ships! Ah me, most utterly unfortunate, who fathered sons of excellence in spacious Troy, yet none remains, neither godlike Mestor, nor horse-loving Troilus, nor Hector, who seemed a god among mankind, and was no son of mortal man, but seemed the child of some divinity.
The War-god slew the others; these are left—our shame:
false speakers, dancers, masters of the chorus-step, thieves of the lambs and kids that belong to their own people.

Will ye not swiftly harness the cart for me, and load on it all these things, that we may set out upon the road?"
He spoke; and they, afraid of their father's rebuke, lifted the smooth-running mule-cart, beautiful, newly made, and bound its wicker basket firmly upon it. From the peg they took the mule-yoke, boxwood, rounded at its center, well fitted to its handles; then they carried out the yoke-band, nine cubits long, with the yoke itself.
They laid it well upon the polished pole's first step, and cast the ring upon its pin; three times on either side they tied it fast around the knob, then drew it tight in order beneath the tongue.
They brought from the chamber to the polished wagon countless gifts, the ransom set upon Hector's head;
and yoked the strong-hoofed mules, whose harness once had been a shining gift the Mysians gave to Priam. The old king brought up the horses which he himself had raised and fed beside the polished manger. Within the lofty house the herald and Priam, both holding wise thoughts, yoked them.
Then Hecuba, her heart oppressed, came near, carrying wine, sweet as honey, in her right hand, within a golden cup, that they might pour before their going. She stood before the horses and spoke, calling the old king by name:

"Pour now to Father Zeus, and pray that thou mayest return home again from the men who hate thee, since thy heart drives thee toward the ships, though I am unwilling. Pray to the dark-clouded Son of Cronus on Ida, who looks upon all Troy;
ask him for a swift eagle, his beloved messenger,
whose strength is greatest among birds, appearing on the right, that thou mayest see it with thine own eyes, and go to the ships of the swift-footed Danaans, trusting in the sign.
But if wide-seeing Zeus will not grant his own messenger, then, though thy desire be fierce, I would not send thee to the ships of the Argives." Godlike Priam answered: "Wife, I will not disobey thee; it is good to lift one's hands to Zeus, and see whether he may pity." He called a housekeeper and bade her pour pure water over his hands.
The attendant stood near, bearing the basin and pitcher together.
The old man washed, received the cup from his wife, then stood within the court, poured wine while gazing upward, and prayed aloud: "Father Zeus, most glorious and greatest, who rulest from Ida, grant that I may come to Achilles, beloved and pitiful, and send a swift eagle, thy own most cherished messenger, whose strength is greatest among birds, appearing upon the right, that I may see it with my eyes, and go to the ships of the swift-footed Danaans, trusting in the sign."

So he prayed; and Zeus, the counsellor, heard him. At once he sent an eagle, the most perfect of winged birds, the dark hunter, whom men also call the dusky one.
As broad as the high-roofed door of a rich man's chamber, strongly fitted with its shining panels, were its wings on either side. It flashed upon the right across the city.
Those who saw it rejoiced, and every heart within them was eased. The old man, hastening, climbed upon his chariot; he drove out from the doorway and the echoing court.
The mules drew first the four-wheeled wagon—Idaeus, the thoughtful herald, guided them; and behind, the horses, which the old king followed, urging them with the whip, swiftly through the city. All his friends followed with him, lamenting loudly, as though he were already going to death.

When they had descended from the city and reached the plain, the sons and sons-in-law turned back toward Ilium; but the two did not escape the notice of wide-seeing Zeus.
When he saw the old man upon the plain, he pitied him, and quickly spoke to his own beloved son, Hermes:
"Hermes, for thou lovest most of all to be a companion to mortal men, and hearest any man whom thou desirest, go now, and lead Priam to the hollow ships of the Achaeans, so that none of the other Danaans may see or know of him before he comes to Peleus' son." He spoke; nor did the messenger, the Slayer of Argus, disobey.
At once he bound beneath his feet the beautiful immortal sandals, golden, ambrosial, which carried him over wet sea and boundless land, together with the breath of wind. He took the wand with which he charms the eyes of mortal men, whom he wishes, and wakes again those who are sleeping. Holding it in his hands, the mighty Slayer of Argus flew; and soon he reached Troy and the Hellespont.
He went upon the road in the likeness of a young prince, just entering the first bloom of youth, when that youth is loveliest.

When they had driven past the great tomb beyond the city of Ilium, they stopped the mules and horses, that they might drink from the river; for dusk had already spread itself upon the earth. Then the herald, seeing Hermes near them, recognized him and spoke to Priam:

“Dardanid, take thought; I see a man, and soon, I fear,

he will destroy us both. Come, let us flee upon the horses, or clasp his knees and supplicate him, if perhaps he may pity us.”

So he spoke; and terror poured through the old man’s mind; the hairs stood straight upon his bending limbs. But the gracious god came near, took the old man’s hand, and asked him:

“Father, how dost thou guide these horses and mules through the immortal night, when other mortals sleep? Hast thou no fear of the Achaeans breathing fury, though they are near thee, hostile and fierce? If one of them should see thee carrying such precious treasures through the swift black night, what thought would then possess thee? Thou art not young thyself, and this companion is an old man too—hardly able to ward off the first who should begin a quarrel.
But I will do thee no harm, and even from another I would shield thee; for thou art like my beloved father.”

Then godlike aged Priam answered: “My dear child, in all this thou hast spoken truly. Yet some god has stretched a hand above me, and sent such a traveler to meet me—one whose form and beauty are fortunate, and whose mind is wise, and whose parents are blessed.”

Then the messenger, the Slayer of Argus, answered him:

“Yes, old man, all this thou hast spoken according to fate.

But come, tell me this truth, and do not hide it:

are ye sending these many beautiful and precious treasures to foreign men, that they may remain safe for thee elsewhere?

Or are all of you already abandoning sacred Ilium,

in fear, since such a man, thy son, the best of all,

has fallen—and he lacked nothing in the battle against the Achaeans?”

“And who art thou, most excellent, and of what parents born?

Thou hast spoken well concerning my unhappy son.”

The messenger, the Slayer of Argus,
answered him:

“Old man, thou testest me, and askest me of noble Hector.

I have seen him often in the glorious battle where men win fame;

I saw him also when he drove the Argives toward the ships, slaying them with sharp bronze. We stood and wondered;

for Achilles, angered with the son of Atreus, would not let us fight.

I am his servant; in a well-built ship I came from Phthia, land of the Myrmidons.

My father is Polyctor. He is rich, but already old as thou art;

six sons he has, and I am the seventh.
By lot I was chosen to come here among them. Now I have come from the ships upon the plain;

at dawn the bright-eyed Achaeans will make battle round the city.

Their kings are impatient as they sit, and cannot hold back the army's eagerness for war."

Godlike old Priam answered: "If thou art indeed a servant of Peleus' son Achilles, tell me all the truth:

is my son still beside the ships, or has Achilles already cut him limb from limb and laid him out for his own dogs?"

The messenger, the Slayer of Argus,
answered him:

"Old man, the dogs have not eaten him, nor the birds; he still lies there beside Achilles' ship, within the shelter, just as he was. The twelfth dawn has risen while he lies there, yet his flesh does not decay, nor do the worms consume him, those worms that eat the men who fall in battle.

At daybreak Achilles drags him without pity around the tomb of his beloved companion; but he does not dishonor him.

Go and see for thyself how fresh he lies, with blood washed away, and no stain upon him. All the wounds are closed—those wounds where the bronze entered him, though many struck him.

So greatly do the blessed gods care for thy son, even in death, because he was dear to them, and dear beyond measure."

The old man rejoiced and answered:
"My child, it is good to give the immortals their due gifts; my son never forgot them, not once, if ever he lived, within his halls. Therefore they remember him now, even in the portion of death. But come, receive this beautiful cup from my hand; save me, and guide me under the gods' protection, until I reach the shelter of Peleus'

son."

The messenger answered: "Thou testest me, old man, though I am younger;

thou wouldst persuade me to accept gifts from thee, without Achilles'
word.

I fear and reverence him too much to rob him, lest some evil afterward come upon me. But I would be thy guide, even as far as famous Argos, whether I walked beside thee on foot or sailed in a swift ship; no man would despise thy guide and rise against thee."

So he sprang upon the chariot, took the whip and reins, and breathed good strength into the horses and the mules.

When they reached the towers, the trench, and the ships, the guards had only just begun their
evening meal;
then the messenger, the Slayer of Argus, poured sleep over them all, and at once opened the gates and thrust back the bars, leading Priam and the shining gifts inside upon the wagon.
When they came to the high shelter
of Peleus' son, which the Myrmidons had built for their king, cutting the pine-tree beams and roofing it above with a thatch of meadow-grass; and when around it they had made a great court for their lord, with close-set stakes, and one pinewood gate, fastened by a single bar, which three Achaeans used to close and three to open—though Achilles alone could close and open it—then gracious Hermes opened the gate for the old man, and brought in Priam and the glorious gifts to the swift-footed son of Peleus. He stepped down from the horses to the earth and spoke: “Old man, know that I am Hermes, an immortal god.
My father sent me as thy guide. But now I return;
I will not enter the eyes of Achilles; it would be unseemly for an immortal to show such honor face to face to mortals.

But go thou within, clasp the knees
of Peleus' son,
and supplicate him for his father, his fair-haired mother, and his child, that thou mayest stir his heart.”
So speaking, Hermes departed toward high Olympus.
Priam leapt down from the chariot and left Idaeus there, to guard the horses and the mules.
The old king went straight into the shelter where Achilles was accustomed to sit.
He found Achilles within; his companions sat apart.
Only two heroes, Automedon and Alcimus, branches of Ares, served him as he sat; he had newly ended his food and drink, and the table still stood beside him.
Great Priam entered unseen, stood near, clasped Achilles' knees, and kissed the hands terrible in battle, hands that had killed so many of his sons. As when a man, stricken by a sudden madness, having killed a countryman, comes among strangers to the house of a wealthy man, and wonder seizes all who see him—so Achilles wondered when he saw godlike Priam;
the others wondered too, and looked upon one another.
Then Priam spoke to him, supplicating:

“Remember thy father, godlike Achilles, like me upon the grievous threshold of old age.
Perhaps the neighbors around him wear him down, and there is no one to ward off trouble and ruin.
Yet he, hearing that thou livest, rejoices in his heart, and every day hopes to see his dear son returning from Troy.
But I am altogether unfortunate: I fathered the best of sons in spacious Troy, and not one, I think, remains.
Fifty sons I had when the Achaeans
came;
nineteen were born to me from one womb, and the others women bore within my halls.
Most of them swift Ares loosened at the knees.
But the one who stood alone, defending the city and its people—Hector, whom thou hast killed but lately as he fought for his country—for his sake I have come now to the ships of the Achaeans, to ransom him from thee; and I bring a ransom beyond counting.
Revere the gods, Achilles, and have pity upon me, remembering thy father. I am more pitiable than he;
for I have endured what no other mortal on earth has endured: I have brought my hand to the mouth of the man who killed my
son.”

So he spoke, and stirred in Achilles the desire to weep for his father.
He took the old man's hand and gently pushed him away.
Then, remembering each other, the one mourned Hector the man-killer, lying released before Achilles' feet; and Achilles mourned his father, and at times Patroclus. The sound of their lament rose throughout the house.
When noble Achilles had taken his fill of mourning, and the desire had gone from his heart and limbs, he rose at once from his seat and lifted the old man by the hand, pitying his gray head and gray beard.
He spoke winged words: “Ah, wretched man, thou hast endured many sorrows in thy heart.
How couldst thou dare to come alone among the ships of the Achaeans,
into the eyes of the man who has destroyed so many of thy brave sons?
Thy heart must be made of iron.
Come, sit upon this seat; though we are grieving, let us lay our pains down within our hearts.
There is no profit in the chill lament; for the gods have spun this destiny for miserable mortals: to live in grief, while they themselves are free from care.
“Two jars stand upon Zeus' floor, filled with gifts he gives:
one holds evils, the other blessings.
To the man with whom

Zeus who delights in thunder mingles the gifts, now evil comes, now good; but to the man to whom he gives only the sorrowful gifts, he makes him disgraced, and grim hunger drives him over the bright
earth;

he wanders honored neither by gods nor mortals.

“So the gods gave Peleus splendid gifts from his birth;

he surpassed all men in happiness and wealth, and ruled the Myrmidons. Though mortal, the gods gave him a goddess for his wife; yet even upon him a god laid this evil:

no race of mighty sons was born to him within his halls, but only one son, born to a death before his time.

Nor do I care for him now that he grows old, since far from his country I sit in Troy, bringing sorrow to thee and to thy children.

“And thou, old man, we once heard, wert blessed:

as far as Lesbos, Makar’s seat, bounds thee within,

and Phrygia lies above, and the boundless Hellespont—men said thou didst surpass all elders in wealth and sons.

But since the gods of heaven brought this sorrow upon thee, battles and slaughter have forever surrounded thy city.

Endure, and do not lament without ceasing within thy heart; thy grief will win thee nothing, nor wilt thou raise thy son again, before another evil first befall thee.”

Godlike aged Priam answered him:

“Do not make me sit, nurseling of Zeus, while Hector lies uncared for in the shelter.

Release him quickly, that I may see him with my eyes;

receive the abundant ransom we have brought thee;

enjoy it, and mayest thou return to thy native land, since thou hast first allowed me to live and look upon the sun.”

Swift-footed Achilles looked darkly upon him and answered:

“Stir me no further now, old man. I myself know well that I must release thy Hector; from Zeus there came to me my mother, daughter of the ancient lord of the sea.

And I know thee too, Priam; thou dost not escape my mind:

some god has led thee to the swift ships of the Achaeans.

No mortal, not even one in the first strength of youth, would dare to come into our army; he could not escape the watchmen’s eyes, nor easily move the bar across our gate.

Therefore trouble my heart no further in its grief, lest, old man, I leave thee not even here within my shelter, though thou art my suppliant, and transgress the commands of Zeus.”

He spoke; the old man feared and obeyed his word.
Then Peleus' son sprang like a lion from the shelter, not alone: Automedon and Alcimus followed him, the two companions whom Achilles honored most after Patroclus, who had fallen. They loosed the horses and the mules from beneath the yoke, and brought within the herald, the old man's clear-voiced companion; they set him down upon a seat, and from the polished wagon they lifted the immeasurable ransom for Hector's head.
But they left two robes and one well-woven tunic, that he might wrap the dead man and carry him home.
Achilles called the serving-women and commanded them to wash the body and anoint it, carrying it aside, so that Priam might not see his son. For, seeing Hector, the old man's wounded heart might fail to restrain his anger, and Achilles' heart might rise again, and he might kill him, transgressing the commands of Zeus. When the serving-women had washed him and anointed him with oil, they cast around him a beautiful robe and tunic. Achilles himself lifted him from the bier and laid him upon it; his companions raised him and placed him upon the polished wagon.

Then Achilles groaned and called his beloved companion by name:
"Be not angry with me, Patroclus, if thou hearest in Hades, that I have released noble Hector to his dear father; for he has given me no unworthy ransom. Of these gifts also I will divide with thee whatever portion is fitting." So speaking, noble Achilles went again into the shelter, and sat upon the richly worked seat from which he had risen, against the farther wall; then he spoke to Priam:
"Thy son is released, old man, as thou didst command; he lies upon the bier. At the rising of the bright dawn thou shalt see him thyself and carry him away. But now let us remember food.
"For even fair-haired Niobe remembered food, though twelve children perished within her house—six daughters and six sons in the flower of youth. Apollo, with his silver bow, killed the sons, angered with Niobe; and Artemis, the archer, killed the daughters, because Niobe had compared herself with fair-cheeked Leto, saying that Leto bore two children, while she herself had borne many.
Though they were only two, they destroyed them all.

For nine days they lay in their blood, and no one was there to bury them; the Son of Cronus had turned the people into stone. On the tenth day the gods of heaven buried them. Yet she remembered food, when she had grown weary with shedding tears.

And now, somewhere among the rocks, in the lonely mountains, on Sipylus, where they say the goddess-nymphs have their beds, the nymphs who dance around Achelous, there, though she is stone, she still digests the sorrows given by
the gods.

“Come, then, noble old man; let us also take food.

Afterward thou shalt weep again for thy beloved son, when thou hast brought him into Ilium; and he shall bring thee many tears.”

Swift Achilles sprang up and slaughtered a white-fleeced sheep.
His companions flayed it and prepared it properly; they cut the meat with skill, spitted it, and roasted it carefully, then drew all the portions away.
Automedon took the bread and set it out in handsome baskets upon the table; Achilles divided the meat. They reached their hands toward the ready food set before
them.

When they had put away their desire
for drink and food,

Dardanian Priam wondered at Achilles—how great he was, and what a man he seemed, for he resembled the immortal gods.

And Achilles wondered at Dardanian Priam in turn, beholding his noble face and hearing his words.

When they had taken their fill of looking upon each other, godlike aged Priam spoke first:

“Tell me now, nurseling of Zeus, and tell me quickly, that already we may find sweet sleep and rest ourselves in slumber.”

“That we may take our fill of sweet sleep and rest in slumber.

For never yet have my eyes closed beneath their lids

since by thy hands my son gave up
his life;

but always I groan, and in the court I digest

countless griefs, rolling myself in the dust and dung.

Now I have tasted food and poured the dark wine down my throat; before this I had tasted nothing.”

Achilles commanded his companions and the serving-women to set two beds beneath the porch, and spread upon them beautiful purple coverlets; over these to lay rugs,

and woolen cloaks above, that they might wrap themselves.

The women went out from the chamber, carrying torches, and quickly, busied, spread the two beds.

Then swift-footed Achilles spoke half in jest:

“Lie outside, dear old man, lest one of the Achaeans enter, some counselor who sits beside me as they sit and devise the counsels that are lawful. If such a man should see thee through the swift black night, he would at once report it to Agamemnon, shepherd of the people; and the release of the dead might then be delayed.
Come, tell me this truth: how many days dost thou intend to mourn noble Hector, that I may stay here myself and hold the people back?”

Godlike aged Priam answered: “If thou wilt grant us to bury noble Hector, thou wouldst make thyself most gracious to me by doing as I say. Thou knowest how we are enclosed within the city, and how far the wood must be brought down from the mountain; the Trojans are very much afraid. For nine days we would mourn him within our halls; on the tenth we would bury him, and give a feast to the people; on the eleventh we would make his burial mound; and on the twelfth, if need should be, we would fight.”

Swift-footed noble Achilles answered: “These things too shall be, old Priam, as thou commandest. I shall hold back the battle for as long a time as thou hast asked.”

So speaking, he took the old man’s right wrist, that he might not fear within his
heart.

There, in the forecourt, the herald and Priam slept, both holding prudent counsels in
their hearts;
but Achilles slept in the recess of the well-built shelter, and beside him lay fair-cheeked Briseis.

All the other gods and men, the horse-harnessed warriors, slept through the night, mastered by gentle sleep;
but sleep did not seize gracious Hermes, who pondered within his heart how he might send King Priam from the ships, unseen by the sacred guards who kept the gates.

He stood above the old man’s head
and spoke:

“Old man, thou hast no care for danger, sleeping thus among the enemy, after Achilles has spared thee. Thou hast now released thy beloved son, and given much for him; but while thou livest, thy sons who remain might give three times as much in ransom, if Agamemnon, son of Atreus, should learn of thee, and all the Achaeans should learn of it.”

He spoke; and the old man was afraid, and woke the herald.

Hermes himself yoked the horses and the mules, and swiftly drove them through the army; no one knew him.

When they reached the ford of the fair-flowing, eddying Xanthus, whom immortal Zeus himself begot, Hermes then descended and went away toward high Olympus. Dawn, clothed in saffron, was spreading over all the earth; and they drove their horses into the city with lamentation and groaning.

The mules carried the dead man. No other man or woman among the beautiful-girdled Trojans knew them; but Cassandra, like golden Aphrodite in her beauty, having climbed upon Pergamos, saw her beloved father standing in the chariot, and the herald who called the city; then she saw Hector lying upon the bed upon the mules.

She cried aloud, and her voice went throughout the city:

“Behold, ye Trojans and Trojan women, and go forth to meet Hector, if ever, while he lived, ye rejoiced when he returned from battle; for he was a great joy to the city, and to all the people!”

So she spoke; nor did any man or woman remain within the city, for unbearable grief had reached them all. They met the dead man near the gates. First his beloved wife and his august mother rushed to the smooth-running wagon, tearing at their hair, and touched his head; the crowd stood round them, weeping.

And now they would have mourned Hector there the whole day, until the sun had gone down, shedding tears before the gates, had not the old man spoken from the chariot to the people:

“Make way for me, that I may pass among the mules; after I have brought him home, ye shall have your fill of weeping.”

So he spoke; and they parted, making room for the wagon.

When they had brought him into the glorious house, they laid him upon the pierced bier, and set beside him singers, leaders of the dirge, to begin the song of mourning.

They sang the lament, and the women groaned around them.

White-armed Andromache began the wailing among them, holding in her hands the head of Hector, slayer of men:

“Hector, thou hast died young, and left me widowed here within our halls; and our child is still a little one, our child, whom thou and I, unhappy parents, bore.

I do not think he shall come into his youth; before that time this city from its height shall be utterly destroyed.

For thou art dead, who wast its guardian, and didst defend it, and keptest safe its reverend wives and little children;

soon they shall be carried away in the hollow ships, and I among them. And thou, my child, shalt follow me, where thou shalt do disgraceful labor before a pitiless lord; or some Achaean, seizing thee by the hand, shall hurl thee from the tower to a bitter death, in anger because Hector killed his brother, or his father, or his son—so many Achaeans bit the vast earth beneath Hector's hands.

"For thy father was not gentle in the grievous battle.

Therefore the people mourn him throughout the city; thou hast made thy parents a lament and sorrow not to be forgotten, Hector; but for me, most of all, grievous pains remain.

For when thou wert dying, thou didst not stretch thy hands to me from the bed, nor speak a thoughtful word which I might remember, shedding tears through the nights and days."

So she spoke in tears, and the women groaned around her.

Then Hecuba began the loud, unceasing lament:

"Hector, dearest of all my children to my heart, while thou wert living, thou wert beloved by the gods; and even in death they have cared for thee. For all my other sons swift-footed Achilles sold, whoever he took beyond the barren sea, to Samos, Imbros, and Lemnos veiled in mist.

But when he took thy life with his long-pointed bronze, many times he dragged thee round the tomb of his companion, Patroclus, whom thou hadst killed; yet he could not raise him again.
And now thou liest fresh and dewy in our halls, like one whom silver-bowed Apollo, moving gently, has struck and killed with his soft arrows."

So she spoke in tears, and stirred an unending cry.

Then Helen, third among them, began her lament:

"Hector, dearest of all my brothers by marriage, my husband is Alexander, beautiful as a god, who brought me here to Troy—would that I had died before!
This is now the twentieth year since I came from my country and left it; yet never have I heard from thee a harsh word, nor one that cut me with reproach. If another in the halls rebuked me—one of thy brothers, or sisters, or the wives of thy well-robed brothers, or thy mother, or thy father, who was always gentle as a father—thou wouldst restrain him with words, through thy own gentleness and gentle speech.
Therefore I mourn thee and myself together, with a grieving heart; for no one else remains in spacious Troy who is gentle to me or a friend. They all look upon me and shudder.”

So she spoke in tears, and the countless people groaned.

Then old Priam spoke among them: “Bring wood now, ye Trojans, from the city, and fear not the Achaeans’ close ambush in your hearts. Achilles charged me, when he sent me away from the black ships, not to suffer harm until the twelfth dawn should come.” So he spoke; and beneath the wagons they yoked oxen and mules, then swiftly gathered together before
the city.

For nine days they brought an immeasurable store of wood.

But when the tenth dawn, the light-bringer, appeared, they carried forth bold Hector,
shedding tears,

set the dead man upon the highest part of the pyre, and cast the fire upon him.

When early-born, rose-fingered Dawn appeared, the people gathered around the pyre of glorious Hector.

When they had gathered and assembled together, first they quenched all the fire wherever the strength of flame had reached, pouring bright wine over it. Then his brothers and companions gathered the white bones, mourning, and hot tears flowed down their cheeks. They lifted them and laid them in a golden chest, wrapping them in soft purple robes.

Swiftly they placed the chest within a hollow grave, and covered it above with great stones, closely set.

They raised the mound with speed, while watchers sat around it, guarding on every side, lest the
well-greaved Achaeans should attack before the mourning had been completed.

When they had raised the mound, they returned again; then, gathered well together, they held a splendid feast within the house of Priam, the king whom Zeus had nourished.

Thus they tended the tomb of Hector, breaker of horses.

Source range: Book 24. Full-book provisional
draft. Not approved for final layout.

PLATE — Priam kneels before Achilles in the night shelter

Original plate candidate by CastaliaInstitute; not by William Blake; informed by the repository's Blake-informed visual language, not by a specific Blake plate. Concept-review placement only.